L I F E
O F
Sir WALTER RALEGH.

EXPERIENCE, and her records, have sometimes manifested to us, That as men, renowned for glorious exploits, abound more in some ages than others, according to the genius of the times, or general taste and pursuit of their contemporaries; so if a martial spirit spring up in the reign of an active and adventurous sovereign, he shall rise into high repute, be much honoured and emulated: As, on the other side, if it is his fortune to live under a prince of a contrary character, his unfashionable virtue, unless it be of a supple nature, and can mould itself to occasions, will become criminal; and his courage, of less security than cowardise.

THE WORTHY, of whose life and fortunes I have been persuaded to attempt a rehearsal, will appear, in the following narrative, a convincing evidence of this observation. And what renders his story more remarkable is, that tho' he gave such repeated proofs of a superior conduct, in so many important stations and characters of life; tho' he was not only master of all the accomplishments requisite to defend a state in war, but to adorn it in peace; and did render himself illustrious, as well by letters in the latter, as he had done by arms in the former condition; yet that a warlike reign was of greater safety to him, and a peaceful one prov'd his destruction. I shall not anticipate the causes, but only premise thus much; That whoever can attend to the representation of a brave man wrestling with adversities, and rising higher in the notice and admiration of the world, the more violently he was oppos'd; whoever is any way concerned to know the effects of those prepossessions which diffident princes may entertain, and the prostitutions to which their sordid instruments may be won; or would be informed, what a pernicious foe in his country an insinuating foreigner may be to those natives who are its real friends; I may recommend him here; and venture to promise a prospect instructive, entertaining, and full of variety.

For tho' abundance of solid particulars are naturally sunk in the rapid current of time, while many less substantial are floating upon the surface, to the hand of every ordinary memorialist: And tho' some shining circumstances, in the prosperous part of Sir Walter Raleigh's life, have been darken'd through envy; as others, in the unfortunate period, through interest, by the age in which he lived; nevertheless, his single life may perhaps be found more fruitful of memorable incidents, than many histories of intire ages: Insomuch, as I may be apprehensive, with a late collector of his memoirs, " That the describing a person of so " diffusive a praise, so equally great in so many different parts of life, will be like at" tempting a landskip from a high hill, where the multiplicity and extent of the prospects
" may

" may rather distract the mind, than direct it ; and call for judgment to restrain the fancy, which is apt to run riot, when employ'd upon too many objects." Many guides may indeed appear to lead us through this wilderness ; but, numerous as the authors are who mention him, they contain but fragments of his story ; divers whereof, hitherto widely dispers'd, have escap'd not only our general historians, but the many compilers of distinct pieces on his actions. Even the moderns, who have treated of him with impartiality, have yet been deficient in point of industry, so as to prove no less injurious to his merits, than some who in his own age conspir'd to depreciate them. Hence the generality, having been too superficial and undigested ; having neither regarded due choice and order of matter, proportion in the parts, or connexion of the whole ; nor yet discharged themselves by such references to proper vouchers, as might satisfy those readers it is my ambition to please ; I have esteemed the number of such writers, no discouragement to the revival of his story.

AND first for the name of Ralegh, otherwise written Rale and Ralega, in some old deeds I have formerly seen ;<sup>a</sup> it is certainly of great antiquity in this kingdom ; since there are some villages and towns in the west, as well as other parts, so call'd,<sup>b</sup> which might at first receive their denomination from some, as well as afterwards give it to others, who were natives or possessors thereof. And since we are credibly inform'd, that one of those districts belonged anciently to noble lords of the same name,<sup>c</sup> as also that several of them were so call'd from the very family we are to speak of :<sup>d</sup> And as the Raleghs of Devonshire will appear to have flourished there before the conquest ; they might be the progenitors of those in other counties ; as it is expressly intimated out of the records they were of those in Warwickshire.<sup>e</sup> But as we are also told of no less than five knights of this name, at one time differently situated in that western county before-mention'd ;<sup>f</sup> and that there were three great families so named also there, contemporary with Sir Walter Ralegh's, who bore arms different from those of his paternal coat ;<sup>g</sup> we may conclude, they were not all of one lineage ; and at the same time, that it is owing to the eminency of this great man, that a distinction of the several houses, and his in particular, when all but his were in a manner extinct, has been so elaborately endeavoured by the antiquaries and genealogists of his own time.

As to the family of Sir Walter Ralegh therefore in particular, it is generally agreed on, that Smalridge in the parish of Axminster, in the county of Devon, was one of their most ancient seats. But Sir William Pole, who is said to have been one of the greatest searchers into the antiquities of that country, has been singularly short in the time of their first settling there. However, if we should agree with him upon that person for Sir Walter Ralegh's direct ancestor, who first removed thither out of Nettlecomb-Ralegh in Somersetshire, in the reign of king Henry III, from whom there is a successive descent of those six knights, Sir Wimond,<sup>h</sup> Sir Hugh, Sir John, Sir Peter, and two Sir Johns more ; besides others, who were either of the same degree themselves, or married into families distinguish'd with it, even down to Wimond the grandfather of Sir Walter Ralegh :<sup>i</sup> I know not but it may be also allowed, that the honours of this pedigree were sufficient to have been boasted of by some of his traducers. For tho', in the eye of heraldry, many titles are accounted more noble than knight-hood ; tho' native and patrimonial dignities, or such as descend necessarily from father to son, may in the eye of the common lineal claimant appear most legitimate ; and such as are venal, be esteemed in that of the wealthy, most valuable ; yet those which are personal, the individual acquisition, or recompence of every man's proper merit, will, in the eye of reason, be held most honourable.

BUT however grateful it may seem in that author, who has characteris'd the aforesaid Sir William Pole, as the first and best antiquary of his county; <sup>a</sup> though none of his works were ever printed; or perhaps now remain sufficient to prove him so to the public; <sup>b</sup> yet we are at liberty to observe, that John Hooker, another famous antiquary and historian of the same county, appears to have been his senior; <sup>c</sup> whose actual publications, several years before Sir William Pole is said to have privately apply'd himself to these studies, had establish'd his character, through the applauses of the best judges in his own time; <sup>d</sup> and who, with respect to Sir Walter Ralegh in particular, being related to, and acquainted with him, had not only the greatest opportunities to be expert in his genealogy, but withal publicly addressing an account thereof to Sir Walter himself, when this knight was in the very meridian of envy and detraction, had the greatest obligations upon him to be strictly accurate in displaying it. Now this author, in one of his performances, gives us to understand; that Smalridge was in the possession of the Raleghs before the Norman conquest; and that one of the family, being taken prisoner by the Gauls, did, for his deliverance upon St. Leonard's day, build, at his return home, a chapel there, consecrated to that saint; and therein, as a grateful monument, hung up his target: <sup>e</sup> the records of which foundation are said to have been given by a priest of Axminster to Sir Walter Ralegh, <sup>f</sup> as their most rightful owner. So much for the antiquity of the family in Devonshire: and as for its derivation, the said Hooker, even in a printed dedication to Sir Walter Ralegh, as I hinted (which he repeatedly confirms in the aforesaid performance) not only avouches his alliance to the Courtenays, earls of Devon, and other illustrious houses; but traces the stream of consanguinity up to the kings of England: where he says, "That one of his ancestors in the directest line, Sir John de Ralegh of Fardel (another feat of their ancient inheritance in the parish of Cornwood, eight miles east of Plymouth) espoused the daughter of Sir Roger D'Amerei, who married Elizabeth daughter of Gilbert earl of Gloucester, by Joan D'Acres, daughter of king Edward I. which Gilbert was descended of Robert earl of Gloucester, son of king Henry I." So goes up to the conqueror: and farther adds, "That in like manner he may be derived by his mother also out of the same house."<sup>g</sup> But since these two authors, the likeliest we have in print to have confirm'd us in the truth of this matter, vary thus from each other; since Sir William Pole thought it rather another family of the Raleghs, which was thus royally descended; since also five or six ancient pedigrees of this family, which I have seen in manuscript, by the heraldical visitors, and antiquaries of those western parts, also differ, not only from Hooker, but in several points both from Sir William Pole, and from one another; and lastly, since it will be consider'd, that I have not undertaken to account for the whole race of the Raleghs, but only one select person of the name, here let the truth, as to these remote ancestors or alliances, hover for me: for I am not moved, on the wings of conjecture, to make my self a party with any of those antiquaries, nor shall endeavour to compromise the difference between them, unless such prevailing authorities had occur'd, as would enable me to do it with certainty. Besides, as those whose virtues have adorned them with a sufficiency of personal honours, are ever least anxious about such as are relative: so it might well argue but little weight in the judgment of a historian, to shew himself contentious <sup>a</sup> The same John Prince, fol. 506, who was honour'd by the descendants of Sir W. Pole with the perusal of what remain'd in his time of that knight's collections; as his ancestor had been by Sir William himself, with an office which he held under him. Ib. fol. 505.

<sup>b</sup> Many of Sir William's MSS miscarried in the civil wars so effectually, that the very titles and arguments of them are likewise perished, as Prince tells us in the same page; and those four or five volumes this author appears to have had some view of, having been since lent about, are thought, and have been reported by some of the family, to be now also irretrievably lost. See the English barons, 12mo. 1728. vol. 1. p. 323. Yet I have been told by a person of great honour and knowledge in curiosities of this kind, that he had heard one volume of those collections, if not more, is somewhere in being.

find by his own words; did actually set forth in print his tracts about the government of Exeter, and bishops of that see; besides his augmentations of the English and Irish chronicles, with other pieces, before, or by the year 1587; and, having lived to near eighty years, died in 1601, according to Anthony Wood, and my said author Prince, in his life; though the former of them quotes from Hooker's own words, that he was living in 1605 (if 'tis not a mistake of the press) and the latter has made no boggle at the blunder.

<sup>e</sup> Hooker's Synopsis Chronographical: or historical record of Devonshire, a MS, as quoted by Prince, fol. 530. A copy whereof, in this author's time, was in the custody of Mr. John Eastchurch of Wood in that county; still extant, as I have heard in those parts; and pity it is, that it has not yet seen the publick light; since above a hundred years ago, it was revis'd by so able a judge of its worth as Sir John Dodderidge, and had his recommendation to the press.

about these feathers for his worthy ; especially such a one, as shall be found to have thought so justly light of them himself.

HOWEVER, as all accounts allow him a very honourable extract ; let us prefer which we please, the freedom some great courtiers took in calling him Jack and Upstart, upon his advancement to queen Elizabeth's favour, is thought to have somewhat reflected rather on themselves ; in suffering their sprightly parts to take such advantage of their noble principles. One of these sarcasms I find recorded by lord Bacon, in his little book of Apophthegms,<sup>a</sup> where he says, “ That when queen Elizabeth had advanced Raleigh, she was one day playing on the virginals, and my lord of Oxford with another nobleman stood by ; when it happen'd that the ledge before the jacks was taken away, so that they were seen ; whereupon that lord and the other nobleman smil'd and whisper'd a little : the queen mark'd it, and would needs know, what was the matter ? His lordship answer'd, They laugh'd to see, that when jacks went up, heads went down.” Though the application of this reflection particularly to Raleigh, if such was made, is disputable, notwithstanding lord Bacon's allusion, yet it is plain, that Sir Robert Naunton, who was secretary of state at the time of Raleigh's death, and whose observations on that queen's favourites were written, though not printed, before those Apophthegms, thought also, that it was made upon Raleigh : for he has said, with relation to this jest by that witty earl, “ We all know it favours more of emulation and his humour, than of truth ; it being a certain note of the times, that the queen, in her choice, never took into her favour a mere new man, or a mechanick.”<sup>b</sup> But it is believ'd, Sir Walter Raleigh himself was afterwards pretty even with his quality-critics ; where he so solidly exposes the emptiness of merit, nay, the real detriment to it, in posterity's being entitled to the rewards of their ancestor's virtues, by hereditary honours ; succession of blood ; and nobility in parchment : those only being truly noble, who by worthy acts have render'd themselves most notable.<sup>c</sup>

tage.

ALL therefore that needs be added on this head, as a matter more immediately requisite, and indeed sufficient for my present purpose, is, That Sir Walter Raleigh was the son of Walter Raleigh Esq ; of Fardel aforesaid ; who being thrice married, had by his first wife Joan, daughter of John Drake of Exmouth in Devon Esq ; two sons, one named George, and the other John ; which last married Anne the daughter of Sir Bartholomew Fortescue of Filley in Devon, and relict of ---- Gaicrick of Ford ; and they had issue. His second wife was daughter of one Darell of London ; by whom he had a daughter named Mary,<sup>d</sup> who was married to Hugh Snedale of Hilling in Cornwall Esq ; and had issue :<sup>e</sup> his third wife was Catherine daughter of Sir Philip Champenon of Modbury, and relict of Otho Gilbert of Compton in Devon Esq ; He had by this last Venter, his third son, Carew, afterwards knighted, and of Wiltshire, who married Dorothy daughter of Sir William Wroughton, and relict of Sir John Thynn ; by whom he had issue ; and lastly, his fourth son, named Walter, the subject of our ensuing discourse ; who was thereby the uterine brother of those three eminent knights, Sir John, Sir Humphrey, and Sir Adrian Gilbert. By this last wife, Mr. Raleigh had also one daughter, named Margaret ; who was married first to ---- Radford of Mount Radford in Devon, clerk of the peace ; and afterwards to ---- Hull of Larkebere Esq ; in St. Leonard's parish, Exeter.<sup>f</sup>

THE family was indeed at this time much declin'd from its former splendor of fame and affluence of fortune : for the estate of Smalridge, which remain'd in the name of Raleigh to the time of king Henry VIII, was then sold, by Sir Walter's grandfather Wimond, to John the father of Sir John Gilbert of Compton ; but I cannot find it reduc'd to that low ebb, in the latter respect, which some have intimated : for Fardel remain'd still in their possession ; which, after the death of Sir Walter's father, fell to the eldest son George ; and there were besides,

<sup>e</sup> Among the errors of the clerk, or transcriber of this visitation, in the paragraph concerning Sir Walter Raleigh's father (too obvious and minute to be here taken notice of) that assertion of this daughter's having no issue should not be deem'd one ; that book being written probably before she was married.

<sup>f</sup> Though Sir W. Pole, in Prince's Worthies, fol. 530, mentions Sir W. Raleigh's father to have been but twice married, omitting his second wife, and also his daughters by her, and his third ; yet as one or both of those daughters will hereafter occur, proving him manifestly defective in that omission, I have thought it most reasonable to follow some other antiquaries of those parts and times, who concur in his marriages and issue as they are here display'd. And for this intelligence, the publick is principally obliged to the incomparable Harleian library ; its noble owner having honour'd me with the permission of collecting it from the pedigrees of the Devonshire gentry, an original MS. by Tho. Westcot, recorder of Totness, fol. sign. 99, C. 16. pag. 59 ; and of collating it with Richard Munday's MS. coll. of pedigrees, fol. sign. 90. A. 10. pag. 53 ; and with the visitation of Devonshire, by Hen. St. George Esq ; Richmond-herald, and Sampson Lennard, bluemantle, deputies for W. Camden Esq ; Clarenceux, Ann. 1620, fol. fig. 64. B. 14. pag. 366. But some of the pedigrees in these books, and others I have seen of Sir Walter Raleigh's family, might perhaps be improved, at least with relation to the more ancient branches ; that is to say, from king Henry II. down to king Henry VIII's reign, out of the valuable old deeds and evidences which remain in the custody of Sir John Trevelyan of Nettlecomb in Somersetshire, Bart.

Widdycomb-Ralegh, and Coliton-Ralegh in their possession; the former of which was sold, by Sir Walter's elder brother Sir Carew Ralegh, to George the natural son of George aforesaid; and the latter was sold, by Sir Walter himself, to Richard Martin, or his father, of Exeter.<sup>a</sup> But neither of these places claim the honour of his birth.

FOR his father having the remainder of a fourscore-years lease, in a pleasant farm call'd Hayes, Birth-place. situate in the parish of Budley, in that part of Devonshire bordering eastward upon the sea, near where the Ottery, or river of Otters, discharges it self into the British channel; and residing upon the said farm during the time of his last marriage: this was the birth-place of Sir Walter Ralegh; and it is accordingly distinguish'd, as for nothing more remarkable, by topographical writers to this day. After the expiration of that lease, Ralegh apply'd, but unsuccessfully, to Mr. Duke of Otterton, to whom the estate devolv'd, to sell it him; as appears by Ralegh's letter to him, wherein he says, "That for the natural disposition he had to the place, being "born in that house, he had rather seat himself there, than any-where else."<sup>b</sup> From whence, it seems, that what some are, by another Devonian antiquary, said to have reported, and himself appears only to have recorded; as if "Sir Walter Ralegh was born in the city of Exeter, and "in the house adjoining to the palace-gate,"<sup>c</sup> has no authority, and perhaps, had not so much as rumour to countenance it.

As to the time of his birth; I find the computation has been made from Camden's account of his age at his death, that he was born in the year 1552. And herewith corresponds an observation I have found in an astrological author, who, fixing his birth in the sixth year of king Edward VI, which answers to the year of our Lord aforesaid, calls it "A year remarkable "in our chronicles; first, for that strange shole of the largest sea-fishes, which, quitting their "native waters for fresh and untasted streams, wandered up the Thames so high, till the river "no longer retained any brackishness; and secondly, for that it is thought to have been some- "what stain'd in our annals with the blood of the noble Seymer, duke of Somerset: events " (says he) surprisingly analogous both to the life of this adventurous voyager, Sir Walter "Ralegh, whose delight was in the hazardous discovery of unfrequented coasts; and also to "his unfortunate death."<sup>d</sup>

THAT his younger years were season'd at the university of Oxford, we may gather from good authorities; as Hooker aforesaid, lord Bacon, and Anthony Wood; which last says, "He Educated at Oxford. "became commoner of Oriel College, in or about the year 1568, when his kinsman C. Cham- "pernon studied there; and that his natural parts being strangely advanced by academical "learning, under the care of an excellent tutor, he became the ornament of the juniors; and was "worthily esteem'd a proficient in oratory and philosophy"<sup>e</sup>. But in that he came so late thither as this author mentions, and stayed so long there as three years, which he afterwards mentions; and, as the biographical fry who follow have nibbled out of him, they are all mistaken: for he will presently appear two years before that time amounts to, in the wars abroad. What time then can we spare for his residence at Christ-Church College also, in that university; whereof Dr. Fuller would needs have him a member, either before or after he was of Oriel; unless we could find, as I fear we shall not, that he return'd from the school of Mars, to that of the Muses? Little more can we expect to have been observed of this more remote part of his life; and yet something more in it has been preserved by lord Bacon aforesaid, who had the judgment to foresee, that every little circumstance would be acceptable of a man, whose fortunes and misfortunes had render'd him so memorable. And indeed it has been represented to me as a matter of no small honour to Sir Walter Ralegh, that a casual expression of his, in his immature and greenest years, should prefer it self to the commemoration of that great philosopher, in his sagest and most advanc'd age. But as he had observ'd, on the nature of things; That great objects may be discern'd through a little crevice; so he knew, with respect to the nature of men, that a great discovery of genius may be made through a small and sudden repartee: and hence might he be moved to remember; "That while Ralegh was a scholar at Oxford, "there was a cowardly fellow, who happen'd to be a very good archer; but having been grossly "abused by another, he bemoaned himself to Ralegh, and ask'd his advice; What he should do "to repair the wrong that had been offer'd him? Ralegh answer'd, Why, challenge him---at a "match of shooting."<sup>f</sup>

How long he continued at the university, is at last rightly concluded by Anthony Wood to be uncertain; but as sure as he thinks himself right in settling him a student of the municipal laws in the Middle Temple, upon seeing a copy of verses he might write in that inn of court; I take this assertion to be a greater uncertainty than the other. For though Sir Robert Naunton, and possibly from him most other writers of Raleigh's life, have also consign'd him to the study of the law, on his leaving Oxford; there is a late author who believes it a mistake so obvious, that no merit can reasonably be assum'd from correcting it:<sup>a</sup> for Sir Walter, at his arraignment, in a reply to the attorney-general, lays a heavy imprecation upon himself, If ever he read a word of law or statutes, before he was a prisoner in the Tower.<sup>b</sup> So that if this Raleigh was the author of that poem before-mention'd, and of the Middle-Temple in that year it was written, which we shall presently arrive at, we must yet take care to keep the lawyer clear from the templar.

For we are expressly told by Hooker, "That, after Raleigh had laid a good ground to build his actions on at the university, he travell'd into France;"<sup>c</sup> and this is confirm'd by Camden, according to whose account of the time, Raleigh could not be, at his departure, above seventeen years of age; and by the occasion of his first going over, it will appear that a military course of life first fledg'd his fame. For as it has been rightly observ'd, Raleigh had the advantage of a stirring age to encourage and exercise his active genius, throughout the whole series of his first engagements. France was now embroil'd in civil wars; England soon after, to divert a menaced danger from the encroaching power of Spain, lent assistance to the then distress'd and humble States of Holland; Spain, by a political reprisal, rais'd stubborn insurrections in Ireland; and the Pope, to make the rebellion more permanent, and more plausible, religiously pretended that kingdom was a perquisite of St. Peter.<sup>d</sup>

BUT first of France: and here we need not recur to the original of those commotions there; need not trace the Hugonots to their fountain-head;<sup>e</sup> apologise for their oppositions against the Guisards; <sup>f</sup> labour to reconcile queen Elizabeth's defence of another prince's oppressed subjects, to the laws of nations, when imminent danger, by such oppressions, threatned her own;<sup>g</sup> nor, lastly, aggravate her motives against France in particular, from their late violation of covenants, relating to the rendition of Calais:<sup>h</sup> these topics being to be sought where they have already been, and it is more proper they should be directly discuss'd. Sufficient therefore it will be, to observe in this place, out of Camden's annals, that though the queen had her hands full of disorders at home, yet she was not wanting either in commiseration or relief to the persecuted protestants of France; and not only exhorted other princes of the same persuasion to lend their hands to the common cause, but supply'd the queen of Navarre with money and men to support it; permitting Henry Champenon, a relation by marriage of the earl of Montgomery, to march with a select troop of a hundred gentlemen volunteers, well mounted and accoutred, into France; who bore in their standard this motto: FINEM DET MIHI VIRTUS: Let valour decide the cause. In the list of these volunteers, was Philip Butshed, with Francis Barclay, men afterwards of note in their time; and this Walter Raleigh, the most noted of all, then a very young man, and first beginning to push his fortune in the world; admodum adolescens, jam primum satis monstratus, says our above-cited annalist.<sup>i</sup>

The greatest historian in France of those times, tells us, this select troop of horse arrived in the French camp, on the 5th of October 1569, and that they were very honourably receiv'd by the queen of Navarre and the princes.<sup>k</sup> But what services distinctly they perform'd in France, or how long they continued there, neither the writers of that country, nor of our own, have, I think, given full satisfaction. This consequence we draw from some circumstances in the latter part of Raleigh's life, that he established himself a considerable reputation while he was in that kingdom; and from our author Hooker aforesaid, "That he spent good part of his youth in wars and martial services there:"<sup>l</sup> agreeable to which, is that passage in another author, who also seems to have known him; where, speaking of his education, he adds; "It was not “part, but wholly gentleman, wholly soldier.”<sup>a</sup> And hence may we not only account for the greatest chasm in all the memoirs which have hitherto appear’d of Sir Walter Ralegh’s life; but also presume, that he was here initiated in those accomplishments both civil and military, through the language and politeness of the people, as well as their warlike and ministerial affairs, whereof he afterwards gave such manifold proofs; and of which, in a period cluster’d with such extraordinary events, he must have here had such an extensive and instructive prospect.

Some French historians tell us, that what with the supplies of queen Elizabeth, who sent the French protestants a hundred thousand angels, besides some pieces of cannon and ammunition; and what with the aids of their other allies, the protestant army, which took the field under admiral Coligny and the prince of Conde, and encamp’d about Limosin, this year of Ralegh’s going over, being in the beginning of their third civil war, amounted to no less than twenty-five thousand fighting men; when the king’s army under his brother the duke of Anjou, being encamp’d at Rochebeille, amounted to above thirty thousand.<sup>b</sup> But others reckon the protestant army of equal number; and observe, tho’ their men and horse died at Limosin in great numbers for want of food and forage; and tho’ a great reward was offer’d for the admiral, dead or alive, that it only added fuel to the fire: for what terror could it strike, says my author, into persons, who headed an army of thirty thousand men, and ventur’d their lives with the utmost bravery on all occasions?<sup>c</sup> As for the insincere league or union of France and England, by the pretended marriage, which appears to have been negotiated two years after between the two crowns;<sup>d</sup> it seems not to have withdrawn these English auxiliaries, at least not him along with them; because Ralegh’s continuance in France would then fall short of Hooker’s implication afore said. But as we shall discover him to have been in that kingdom beyond the death of king Charles IX., which from Ralegh’s entrance thither is about five years; and that in this compass of time near thirty battles, sieges, overthrows, treaties, and capitulations on one side or other may be enumerated; it is manifest that our young volunteer was hazardously engaged in some, if not several of them. He had afterwards occasion to mention, upon his observing here, the ill consequence of having commanders in equal power, whom it is almost impossible to chuse of equal courage and discretion, “How well he remember’d, that when the prince of Conde was slain after the battel of Jarnac, the protestants did greatly bewail his loss, in respect to his religion, person, and birth: yet that comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than hinderance to their affairs; for (as he judiciously proceeds to distinguish between the military virtues of this prince, and the admiral afore said) so much did the valour of the one out-reach the advisedness of the other; that whatsoever the admiral intended to win, by waiting the advantage; the prince adventur’d to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.”<sup>e</sup> In another place Ralegh speaks of a stratagem which he and his company used with success at Languedoc, where the enemy had fortified themselves in certain caves which had but one narrow entrance cut in the mid-way of the high rocks, and “which (says he) we knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine; till at last, by certain bundles of lighted straw let down by an iron chain with a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it were so smother’d, that they surrender’d themselves, with their plate, money, and other goods, therein hidden; or they must have died like bees that are smoak’d out of their hives.”<sup>f</sup> And in another place he gratefully takes notice of a deliverance he had in these wars. ’Tis where, reasoning upon the manner and opportunities of retreats in battle (with that sagacity and experience which are no strangers in his writings) he first gives an example of its being less dishonour to retire in the dark, than to be ruin’d in the light, in the sentiment of M. de la Noue, upon the retreat made just before the battle of Moncouthour. “For (says that Frenchman) staying upon our reputation in shew, not to dislodge by night; we lost our reputation indeed, in dislodging by day; whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruin: yet (says Ralegh) did that worthy gentleman count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncouthour with so great resolution, as he saved one half of the protestant army, then broken and disbanded, of which my self was an eye-witness, and was one of them who had cause to thank him for it.”<sup>g</sup> But by what means Ralegh escaped that comprehensive destruction which broke out in the third year of this turbulent period, unless with young Sidney (afterwards a knight of great renown for his own accomplishments, and the patronage of other men's, then upon his travels in France) he took sanctuary in the ambassador Walsingham's house,<sup>a</sup> we despair at this distance of learning: for then the cruel and insidious young king aforesaid, inflam'd by the queen mother, and her firebrands of religion, perpetrated that horrible massacre of all the protestants in the capital city, and other parts of his realm; the invitation to which was the nuptials of his sister; the signal to which was the bell they rung to their pious mattins; and in the execution whereof, among many thousands, fell the great admiral aforesaid, by the procurement of his implacable enemy the duke of Guise.<sup>b</sup> And though the comet, which soon after glar'd out of the face of heaven upon these bloody actors for many months together,<sup>c</sup> seems to have wrought little remorse or contrition in them during life; yet is their untimely and violent end, with the extirpation of the very line of Valois, somewhat remarkable; especially that of this king himself, whose early delight in hunting of wild beasts, thus improved to the slaughter of his fellow-creatures; till in less than two years after that inhuman massacre, his insatiable thirst of his people's blood, was quenched by an irresistible extravasation of his own.<sup>d</sup>

Now that Raleigh was, till the death of that king, and even longer, in France, we may be fully convinc'd, from the further light I have fortunately met with, in an eminent author of his own time. For Mr. Richard Hakluyt, in his most excellent collection of voyages, dedicating his translation of a French adventure therein to Sir Walter Raleigh, tells him, That "calling to mind you had spent more years in France than I, and understand the French better than my self; I perceiv'd you approve my endeavour, not for any private ease, but for the special care you had of those to be employ'd in your own-like enterprize."<sup>e</sup> And how long Hakluyt had been in France, appears in his dedication to Sir Francis Walsingham of his first edition of those voyages;<sup>f</sup> where he takes the occasion to tell his patron, that himself had been five years in that kingdom: so that Raleigh must have been at least six years there.

AND this will lead us near the time we are to look for him in London, if we take for our guide in the chronology of Raleigh's life, that copy of verses before-mentioned which Anthony Wood took for his, in relation to Raleigh's profession. These verses I have found to be a commendatory poem of three stanza's, by Walter Rawley of the Middle Temple, as he is there written; and printed among others, before a satire call'd the Steele glass, published in 1576, by a learned and ingenious poet of repute in those days, named George Gascoigne Esq;<sup>g</sup> an Essexian born, and therefore nearly related, as I take it, to that excellent genealogical antiquary of the same surname, who afterwards lived, and died I think, in Yorkshire; and of whom I

<sup>b</sup> The massacre of Paris was begun on St. Bartholomew's day 1572. And if between Mexeray's estimate of the numbers that were butcher'd over France, which is one of the least; and Perefixe's, which is one of the largest, we incline to the medium; we shall prefer the computation of Natalis Comes, who wrote earlier, and about the very time. He reckons them at three score thousand. And so insatiable was the fury of these parricides, that they spared neither age, sex, nor quality; vel puberes, vel impuberes, says he, trucidati sunt; neque ullius sexus, vel ætatis, vel dignitatis, habita est ratio. vid. Hist. Nat. Com. lib. 23. p. 508. But yet Sir W. Raleigh, in one of his MS discourses on the marriage between England and Savoy, hereafter more particularly spoken of, numbers them (not yet so high as some of their own historians) at no less than a hundred thousand. And Margaret, queen of Navarre, confesses in her memoirs, liv. 1. That several of her brother's friends fell as well as his enemies, in the blind rage of this diffusive and undistinguishing desolation. Insomuch that in contempt of all princely promises and protestations of amity, their historians were suffer'd to boast, More hereticks had been destroy'd in that one day, than in all the twelve years of the war. Well therefore did that deputy of the reformed religion, in his treaty for a peace with the king and queen mother, which they agreed to, insist upon security for the preservation of it: and when the queen mother said, Why, is not the word of a king sufficient security? Well did he answer; No, by St. Bartholomew, Madam. How much this flagrant exploit was gloried in over France and Rome, their processions, thanksgivings, medals, and jubilee, will sufficiently declare.

out beard or tail, on the back-side of Cassiopeia's chair, and on the edge of Lactea via; that it was between the size of Jupiter and Venus, and had then appear'd three weeks in England. In another letter to Walsingham, he notes how much the French and English astronomers varied as to the placing this star in the signs of the Zodiac. See Sir Dudley Digges's compleat ambassador, fol. 299, and 316. But Camden, in his annals of queen Elizabeth, more particularly observes it to have shone brighter than the planet of Jupiter in the perigee of his eccentric and epicycle; that it continued in the same place full sixteen months; though after eight months it visibly diminished. Mr. Thomas Digges and Dr. John Dee, two famous mathematicians of those times, have learnedly proved by the doctrine of Parallaxes, that it was fixed in the celestial, not the elementary region; and that it disappeared by ascension. Theodore Beza very ingeniously apply'd it to the star which appear'd at the slaughter of the Innocents under Herod. And queen Elizabeth's gallant comportment at the sight of it, from her window at Richmond, which ought not to have escaped her annalist aforesaid, is preserved by the earl of Northampton, in his learned Defensative against the poison of supposed prophecies. 2d edit. fol. 1620. p. 77.

have elsewhere more particularly spoken. Now though I have had the opportunity of seeing some original manuscripts of Sir Walter Raleigh's writing, and his name written several times by his own hand, I shall not cavil at the pseudography thereof before the said printed copy of verses; because I could instance greater errors of the like nature, which yet have not excluded authors from the reputation of their compositions; but more especially, because there are some glimmering circumstances which render the writing of that piece by this our author probable to me: as namely, a kind of familiar dependency which that Gascoigne had upon the lord Gray of Wilton; as in the dedication of this, and some other of his works, is evident; under which nobleman Raleigh will soon after appear to have served in the wars of Ireland. Again, Gascoigne had led a life somewhat like Raleigh in foreign travel and military services: then 'tis to be noted Gascoigne used the very motto, under his picture prefix'd to that satyr before-mention'd; which, after his death, is so well known to have been assumed by, or appropriated to, Raleigh himself; Tam Marti, quam Mercurio. All which seem to shadow out the links, if not the perfect chain, of some acquaintance between them. But the poem it self, to me, discovers, in the very first line of it, a great air of that solid axiomatical vein, which is observable in other productions of Raleigh's muse:

Sweet were the sauce would please each kind of taste.

And the whole middle Hexastic, is such an indication of his own fortune or fate; such a caution against that envy of superior merit which he himself ever struggled with; that it could proceed from no hand more properly than his own.

*Though sundry minds in sundry sort do deem;
Yet worthiest wights yield praise to every pain:
But envious brains do nought, or light esteem,
Such stately steps as they cannot attain:
For who so reaps renown above the rest,
With heaps of hate shall surely be oppress'd.*

Lastly, As to the particular of his being at this time of the Middle Temple, all we can conclude of it is, since he has so publicly and solemnly protested he never studied the law there; that it might be as customary in the inns of court then, as it is now, for a young gentleman to be with a friend, or have the use of his chambers while he is out of town, or even have chambers of his own, rather than be confin'd to the singularities of a family in lodgings, and never read a word of the law; much less have any purpose to practise it. And this is strengthened by what I have met with both in some old writings, and some historians of those times, which observe, that the inmates not only in private houses, but those who dwelt among the lawyers, and did not follow their profession, grew so numerous and inconvenient, that there was an order or proclamation for their removal out of the inns of court about the latter end of queen Elizabeth's, or the beginning of her successor's reign.<sup>a</sup>

In what sense he might be of the Middle Temple.

His next stage of action was in the Netherlands, according to one of the writers of his life; who tells us he served under the prince of Orange, as a volunteer against the Spaniards; making himself, in the low-countries, master of the art military; and confirming, through the success of his first campaigns, his resolution to advance himself by arms, as the nobler and readier way to glory.<sup>b</sup> Sir Robert Naunton also intimates, that before he was in Ireland under the lord Grey, he was engaged in the Low-countries, and also in a voyage at sea.<sup>c</sup> Another author likewise agrees in this Low-countries service, and voyage at sea, before Raleigh was known at court.<sup>d</sup> But whereas the first of these two writers mentions an earlier expedition of Raleigh's in Ireland, before this of the Low-countries, as his first exposure to a military life, being ignorant of all the time he pass'd in the French wars; and whereas the last fixes him in that first Irish expedition, under general Norris; I apprehend them to be herein both mistaken; the former, in that Raleigh appears not to have been twice against the rebels in Ireland, nor once as his first engagement in war; and the latter, in that this Norris appears not to be in Ireland, when the course of Raleigh's employments will allow him to have been in that kingdom:

Goes to the Netherlands.

<sup>a</sup> Further; to confirm this conjecture of Raleigh's being only an inmate there, I have been led to enquire after the registers of the Middle Temple, which are still extant, of those times; and upon a diligent search, have satisfy'd my self that there was no such person enter'd as a student of the law in that inn, by the name of Walter Raleigh, or any name like it, either in this year that he wrote the abovesaid poem from thence, or any other year before, up to the beginning of queen Elizabeth's reign: though some of his countrymen, and I think relations, occur there in that space of time.

But now that there is room for Raleigh's being in the Netherlands we find general Norris to be there.

For the emperor Charles's natural son Don John of Austria, a brisk, forward young man, flush'd with the late victorious battle of Lepanto against the Turks, and high in the Pope's favour; being sent by his brother the king of Spain in the year 1577 governour of the Low-countries, to divert his mind from higher reaches at home; and having incurr'd the general odium of the states for his tyranny over them, no less than the jealousy of the English, for his treachery to this nation; queen Elizabeth thought the Dutch now more immediately needful of her notice; and more particularly from a discovery that had been made to her, some say, by the prince of Orange, of a vain project the said Don John had form'd of rescuing the queen of Scots out of prison; and by marriage with her, or the force of arms, to dethrone the queen of England, and make himself master of her crown: for Don John's haughty conceit of himself, says Raleigh, overcame the greatest difficulties, tho' his judgment was over-weak to manage the least.<sup>a</sup> Wherefore the queen not only receded from that peace with the Spaniards, and neutrality then in agitation; but sent the States both men and money, as they had requested, to carry on the war more powerfully against them. Among the forces, both English and Scotch, which now poured over, under Sir John Norris, Sir Robert Stewart, colonel John North, Henry Cavendish, and others, not to forget colonel Thomas Morgan; whose veteran troops were the first perfect harquebusiers of our nation, and the first who taught us to like the musket;<sup>b</sup> there is here, and here only, I think, a vacancy in the story of Raleigh, that will admit of him under the first of those commanders: so might he probably share in the danger and honour of that memorable Lammas day, Anno 1578, which buried the reputation of Don John; which this governour did not two months survive; and which has raised the emulation of pencils, as well as pens, to commemorate. For the states having thus gather'd a powerful army, and planted themselves near the village of Rimenant, about a league from Mecklin; Don John, at the head of, some say thirty thousand men;<sup>c</sup> being assisted by the prince of Parma, Mondragon, and other the best commanders of Spain, now resolved to give them battle. He made a furious onset; but in the end, by a notable stratagem, was deluded to a great overthrow.<sup>d</sup> For perceiving, as he thought, the whole confederate army encamped before the said village, in an open and inviting plain; Don John, too rash to take advice, and too raw to prevail without it, precipitously detach'd a stronger force to encounter them; which so succeeded on both sides, that the states army, after a convenient resistance, feigning a flight, quitted this their counterfeit camp; the Spaniards eagerly pursuing, in a scattered and disorderly manner, to compleat their supposed victory; till, amaz'd, they found themselves in the midst of the fugitives true camp, environ'd with nineteen thousand horse and foot; a number considerably greater than the assailants. To extricate themselves was impossible; there was a river on one side; when they attempted the thicket on the other, it was lined with an armed ambuscade of English and Scots; and when they assaulted the trenches, they could not sustain the fury of the artillery. Yet was the battle vigorously maintained from morning till night; tho' the English and Scots, harrafs'd by a long and wearisom march, came but a day, some say but an hour, to the field, before the encounter began: and yet partly thro' bravery, partly thro' the sultry warmth of the weather; or, as one author has it, more sensible of a little heat of the sun, than any cold fears of death,<sup>e</sup> they made themselves further remarkable, by stripping off armour and cloaths, and fighting in their shirts; till at last, those who had pursued the states army in a pretended flight, were themselves driven, with great slaughter, to a real one. And had count Bossu, La Noue, with the rest of the states commanders, been but vigorous in charging the Spaniards upon this retreat, it would have proved an absolute discomfiture, and might have put an end to all succeeding oppressions. But it was sufficient to chastise Don John for the faithless treaties of peace wherewith he had abused the states, upon his entrance into that government. "The fortune of the day (says my last author) may be better ascribed to the service of the English and Scots, by comparing this charge near Rimenant, where the English and Scots were in great numbers, with the like charge given by Don John, half a year before at Gemblosers, where the success was contrary; there being at that time but a handful of English and Scots, and they put into confusion by their own horses."<sup>f</sup>

Soon after, a prospect presented it self for Raleigh to try his fortune in another element; for his brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, having now newly obtain'd a patent of the queen to plant and inhabit some northern parts of America, unpossess'd by any prince with whom she was in alliance, soon engaged Raleigh, upon his return into England, who was always ready to grasp at every occasion, that might reputably advance his fortune or his knowledge, to embark in this adventure. For tho' the coasts from the cape of Florida northwards to the isles now called the Newfoundlands, had been before discovered by John Cabot the father, with Sebastian and Sancius his sons,<sup>a</sup> both Englishmen born, through the authority and expence of king Henry the seventh; yet there wanted not only more inland researches and the establishment of Christianity, but the very trade and commerce with Newfoundland was very slothfully neglected, even since the reign of king Edward VI;<sup>b</sup> for our merchants and adventurers in his time enrich'd this nation considerably from their fishery in those parts, as appears by that act,<sup>c</sup> wherein care is taken to prevent the exaction of any doles or taxes from them by the officers of the admiralty, that they might not be discourag'd from the merchandise of fish, but transport it more plentifully into the realm, and at more reasonable rates. Now Gilbert having, as I said, procured an ample commission to repossess these advantages with improvement, by piercing more effectually into the bowels of those tracts which extend immensely into the north from thirty, or rather twenty-five degrees of septentrional latitude, many gentlemen of good account resorted to him, among whom we shall find his brother Raleigh to be one; so that from these preparations was expected a potent fleet. Nevertheless, among such variety of volunteers, dispositions were various; which in the end bred division, and even confusion of the attempt: for, after the shipping was by degrees prepared, and the men ready to go aboard; some disagreeing in opinion, some shrinking at obedience, and others failing of their promises and engagements; the greater number were dispersed, leaving the general, with a few only of his assured friends. "However, with these he ventur'd to sea; where, having tasted " of no less misfortune, he was shortly after driven to retire home with the loss of a tall ship;

 " and more to his grief, of a valiant gentleman named Miles Morgan."<sup>d</sup> Now this misfortune at sea, and loss of a ship with that valiant gentleman, I have not only reason to believe was by a sharp encounter they had with the Spaniards, however tenderly touch'd at that time, perhaps to avoid their triumph, by my author before referr'd to; but that Raleigh was in this very engagement, and his life in great danger thereby. For there is another author, who, in his address to him before-mention'd, tells him, that after his return from his land-services, having gained sufficient knowledge and experience therein, "To the end that you might be every way
 " able to serve your prince and commonwealth (says he) you were desirous to be acquainted " with maritimal affairs: then you, together with your brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, travel" led the seas for the search of such countries as, if they had then been discover'd, infinite com" modities in fundry respects would have ensued; and whereof there was no doubt, if the fleet
 " then accompanying you had, according to appointment followed you; or your self had " escaped the dangerous sea-fight, when many of your company was slain, and your ships
 " therewith also sore batter'd and disabled."<sup>e</sup> This unfortunate adventure cannot, I think, be confounded with that second attempt upon Newfoundland, made afterwards by these two brothers, because from this, Sir Humphrey Gilbert never return'd, as we shall hear; besides, the course of this voyage is so particularly recorded, that we may affirm no sea-fight, or any such desertion of adventurers happen'd therein; and as we know how to account for a good part of Raleigh's time, till that second attempt was more notoriously made; so we may from thence, and the delays aforesaid, be able to compute that this first, happen'd in 1579; for I have at last found the fleet was preparing, but not set out, in the latter end of the foregoing summer.<sup>f</sup>

In a dangerous sea-fight.

<sup>a</sup> And perhaps before them, by Madoc ap Owen Guyneth, a British prince, who is said in the Welsh chronicles to have transported himself and some colonies to these parts about the year 1170, where he named several of the places and productions after the language of his own country, which remain to this day; as the fruit called Guyneth, from his own name; and the bird call'd Pengwin, which is Welsh for white-head, whereof, from the abundance of the birds so marked, there is an island still so call'd: and many other Welsh words they have in use. See Sir George Peckham's report of the discovery and possession of Newfoundland in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 173. And Hessel's letters, vol. 2. no. 54.

<sup>b</sup> And yet within four years before Sir Humphrey Gilbert obtain'd his patent, there resorted to the coasts of Newfoundland for fish about fifty sail, of English, above a hundred sail of Spaniards for cod, and thirty more from Hiscoy for whale to make train oil; about fifty sail of Portuguese; and about an hundred and fifty sail of the French and Irish. My author observes, that the trade our nation had then to Iceland, was the reason the English were not there in such numbers as other nations. See Ant. Parkhurst's letter in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 132.

<sup>f</sup> There is an old dramatic performance (lately imparted to me by Mr. Thobald) entitled, The history of Promos and Cassandra, written by George Wretstons, Gent. who, in his dedication thereof to W. Fleetwood Esq; recorder of London, expresses himself, "Resolved to accompany that excellent captain Sir Humphrey Gilbert, in this honourable voyage" and concludes with his prayers that God would preserve him in it, 29 July 1578.

THIS ill success kept not these adventurers long abroad; and now new disturbances broke out which call'd for men of experience in war at home. For the first dart of any consequence which was thrown from Spain or Rome upon Ireland, being in 1580, we shall then find Raleigh among that body of his countrymen which effectually broke its force, and shielded off the mischief wherewith it would otherwise have gall'd that kingdom. For as to the invasion of Thomas Stucley, two years before, it blew over into Africa; where that meteor of ostentation, and tool of ambitious princes, fell in the plains of Alcazar, and with royal company expir'd. But now that James Fitz-Morris of the Geraldine family was come over,<sup>a</sup> and not long after San Josephe, under the pope's banner, with Spanish and Italian forces, to assist the Desmonds in the Munster rebellion, and had landed in three ships at Smerwick in Kerry; where having built a fort which they call'd Fort del Ore, and re-fortify'd it with the benedictions of Allen an Irish, and Sanders an English jesuit; the Irish rebels under Sir James and Sir John, brothers to the earl of Desmond, soon resorted thither to join, as the English forces also did to disperse them. Their ships were soon taken by Thomas Courtenay, a Devonshire gentleman; and Fitz-Morris himself, for a prey he had made of some garons and other cattle, was by Sir William Burk and his sons soon slain, and his quarters expos'd at Kilmallock. The next, whose fate drew on, was Sir James Desmond; who, on the fourth of August in the above-mention'd year, having made an inroad upon Muskerry, and taken a great booty from Sir Cormac Mac Teige, sheriff of Cork; the said sheriff making head against him, recover'd the booty, wounded Sir James mortally, and took him prisoner. In that condition he was kept, till by letters from the lord justice named Sir William Pelham, and the council, he was deliver'd to Sir Warham Sentleger, then provost-marshal of Munster, and to captain Raleigh; and according to the commission directed to them, he was examin'd, indicted, arraign'd; and then, upon judgment, drawn, hang'd, and quarter'd; and his head and limbs impal'd upon the city gates of Cork, for a terror to his associates, and a prey for the fowls of the air. Thus the pestilent Hydra of this rebellion lost another of his heads:<sup>b</sup> and this is the first appearance we meet with of Raleigh in Ireland; <sup>c</sup> enough to shake the report of those who say he was a militia there,<sup>d</sup> and had his first commission from Arthur lord Grey, baron of Wilton; tho' indeed under him we shall find the greatest part of Raleigh's services in this kingdom perform'd: for that lord came over deputy of Ireland on the twelfth of August aforesaid; but the sword was not resign'd to him by the lord justice Pelham till a month after.<sup>e</sup>

the wars of Ireland.

THIS lord Grey was reputed a warm and sanguine man, somewhat wanting among the Irish, perhaps in Julius Agricola's qualification, who knew how to temper what was necessary in his government of the Britons with what was agreeable: for the English governor is thought to have been so zealous of a healthy constitution, as scarcely to refrain from scarifying the parts which were sound, that he might be sure of clearing away those which were infected; and gave some proofs he agreed in the sentiment of a succeeding deputy, That the Irish were like nettles, sure to make those smart who gently handled them; but must be crushed to prevent stinging. His first expedition against the Obrines, whom he is thought to have attack'd rashly to his disadvantage in their woods and fastnesses before he was sworn, lost him some credit, and several brave English officers. But the chief commander in these parts at this time was the earl of Ormond, soon after governor of Munster, a man of such loyalty, as to have reduc'd his rebellious brothers to allegiance; and of such courage, as constantly partaking in every danger with his own soldiers, made him much beloved by all his adherents; while his apparent contempt thereby of that danger, gain'd him no less fear from all his adversaries. He, on the other side, bending his course against the foreign enemy, encamped his army at Tralegh, within ken of the Spanish fort aforesaid: hereupon many of those invaders dislodged, whom the earl valiantly engag'd, slaying some, and taking others prisoners; the rest flew to the coverts of Glaningell. The prisoners he took, confess'd their force was not above seven hundred strong; but that they had brought arms and ammunition for five thousand natives, besides a mass of money for the Desmonds and Dr. Sanders, and daily expected farther supplies from Rome; for it was absolutely determin'd by the pope and king Philip to make a compleat conquest of Ireland, and England besides; nay, so confident they seem'd of success, if we can credit the assertion of an author who was this year in Spain, that his holiness had provided a chalice to drink the queen of Eng- land's precious blood,* says he, as soon as she should be made a sacrifice. Now after the aforesaid defeat, about three hundred of the enemy having made their way back to the fort, the earl followed them close, and encamped at Dingle: but wanting ammunition for a battery, was forced to retire. And, finding himself of unequal force to withstand another salley the Spaniards made, return'd to join the deputy at Rakele; who having now about eight hundred horse and foot with him, under the conduct of captain Ralegh, Zouch, Denny, Mackworth, and others, decamped and marched up towards the fort. But Ralegh, who had observ'd it to be the custom of the Irish Kerns, upon any dislodgment of the English camp, to flock in parties thither, and glean away whatever they saw left behind; linger'd, and lay in ambush to receive them. They came accordingly with their wonted constancy and greediness; but in the midst of their proling, Ralegh fell upon them so advantageously, that he enclos'd them all with his men, and took every rebel upon the spot, who was not slain in resistance. Among them there was one laden with withies, who being demanded, What he intended to have done with them? Boldly answer'd, To have hung up the English churls. Well, said Ralegh; but they shall now serve for an Irish kern: so commanded him to be immediately tuck'd up in one of his own neckbands; and dealt with the rest of these robbers and murderers according to their deserts.<sup>b</sup> We read of another Irish rebel, but of greater rank, named Brian O Rourk; who being afterwards to suffer at the gallows, shew'd great concern that it was to be by the common halter; and earnestly petition'd, not for pardon or preservation of his life, but that they would change the instrument of his death; and instead of a rope, to let him take his swing in a withy: but being ask'd, Why he insisted upon such an insignificant distinction? he answer'd, 'Twas a distinction had been paid to his countrymen before him. I remember lord Bacon ingeniously applies this example to illustrate the force or tyranny of custom.<sup>c</sup>

Irish Kerns at Rakele.

WHILE the lord deputy lay before the fort, there arriv'd in the bay of Smerwick, vice-admiral Bingham, and soon after Sir William Winter, admiral of the fleet, with fresh supplies: hereupon the lord deputy resolv'd to besiege the fort by land, while the admiral should batter it by sea. But first the Spaniards were summon'd to surrender at discretion: they answer'd, "They were sent, some, from the holy father, who had given that realm to king Philip; and some from that king, who was to recover this land to the church of Rome, which by her majesty's means was become schismatical and excommunicate; therefore, in short, were obliged to retain what they had, and recover what they could."<sup>d</sup> Nor did they omit the advantage they thought this parley would produce of finding the English unguarded, to make a sally upon them; but they were so disappointed, through the vigilance and valour of Ralegh's company, and that of captain Denny, that such as were not left dead behind, were forced to retreat with more haste than good speed. The culverins and other pieces of ordnance being now landed, and a large mountainous bank laboriously cut through, for the carriages to pass to the place convenient for planting them; the deputy is said, by my author Hooker, to have given the enemy another summons by cannon-shot to surrender, and receive mercy.<sup>e</sup> But they answer'd as before: thereupon the artillery was order'd to attack the fort both by land and water. Ralegh, as the same historian records, commanded the first three days after the opening of the trenches; and assaulted the fort so roughly from his battery, that he forced the Spaniards to several excursions; but they skirmish'd so warily, and hived again so nimbly, that there was no closing with them effectually. The fourth day was commanded by Zouch, under whom a tall proper gentleman, named John Cheke, the son of a knight well known among the learned for his writings, venturing so near the fort as to look over the parapet, paid his life for his curiosity; being observed by a Spaniard, who levell'd his piece, and brought him to the ground. But now the trenches for the full battery were drawn so near the Spaniards, and the English play'd their cannon so furiously and incessantly upon them from every side, that the enemy began to fear, somewhat prophetically, what they had built for a garrison would prove their monument, and they should be buried alive in the ruins of it. Therefore, finding no succours arrive, they beat a parley, and hung out the white flag, crying out Misericordia, Misericordia; but the lord deputy would not listen to any treaty with the confederates of traitors and rebels; no, not so much as to their departure with bag and baggage, or free passage to any one particular person; nothing but an absolute surrender. And as for mercy, which Hooker before intimates to have been offer'd on proviso of their timely submission, we find by

Edmund Spenser, who was then secretary to the lord deputy, and upon the very spot, that his lordship never gave the Spaniards any hopes of it. For as this author writes, “ When first “ their secretary Seignor Jeffrey, an Italian, was sent to treat with the lord deputy for grace,
 “ he was flatly refused it ; and afterwards, when their colonel, named Don Sebastian, came forth “ to entreat that they might part with their arms like soldiers, and at least be spared their lives, “ according to the custom of war and law of nations ; it was strongly deny’d him, and told “ him by the lord deputy himself, that they could not justly plead either custom of war or law “ of nations ; for that they were not any lawful enemies ; and if they were, he insisted upon “ their shewing by what commission they came thither, into another prince’s dominions, to war ?
 “ And when they said they had none to produce ; but were only adventurers, that came to “ seek fortune abroad, and to serve in wars among the Irish, who desired to entertain them,
 “ it was then answer’d, that the Irish themselves, as the earl and John of Desmond, with the rest, “ were no lawful enemies, but rebels and traitors ; and therefore they, who came to succour “ them, no better than rogues and runnagades ; especially coming with no licence or commis“ sion from their own king : wherefore it would be dishonourable for him, in the name of his “ queen, to condition, or make any terms with such rascals. So left to their choice, whether “ they would yield themselves, or not.”<sup>a</sup> Then the said colonel did absolutely yield himself, the fort, with all therein ; and craved only mercy, which it was not thought good (says my said author) to shew them.

Enters the Puts the Spaniards to the sword.

For after the lord deputy had by captain Jaques Wingfield, master of the ordnance, disco-ver’d they were in earnest ; that they had yielded, and surrender’d the fort, on the ninth of November,<sup>b</sup> Raleigh and Mackworth, who had the ward of that day, first enter’d the castle, and, with their companies, made a great slaughter ; so that except one Irish nobleman, who was repriev’d ; another Irishman, and an Englishman, who were sent to publick execution ; except also San Josepbo the Spanish commander, and his camp-master ; with a few Spanish officers, who were sent prisoners into England, and reserv’d for ransom ; all the invaders, between four and five hundred, were, according to the deputy’s positive command, put to the sword ; and the country was thus weeded of these noxious foreigners. As for Raleigh, he never was taxed, that I can learn, with any cruelty upon this account, more than Mackworth, or the rest of the officers : but notwithstanding it was afterwards alledg’d, that the English army there was not enough to keep the enemy all prisoners, and ready to mutiny for want of their provisions out of the fort ; or that the English expected hourly assaults from the Irish rebels, more than fifteen hundred at hand ;<sup>c</sup> or fresh opposition from Spain, three thousand carbines being in readiness to come over ;<sup>d</sup> or that they had not barks enough to transport their prisoners into England ; or that an article in the deputy’s instructions themselves, was to shorten the war by effectual prosecutions ;<sup>e</sup> queen Elizabeth did afterwards express much dissatisfaction at this decisive conduct in the said lord deputy.

His commission to seize upon Barry-Court.

RALEIGH, as Hooker goes on, was quarter’d this winter at Cork ; where he observ’d the seditious practices of David lord Barry, Patrick Condon, and other ringleaders of the rebellion in those parts, to distress so intolerably those subjects who were peacefully inclin’d, and foment the disaffected to an insurrection ; that he was forced to take a journey in person to the lord deputy at Dublin ;<sup>f</sup> where he remonstrated the dangerous consequences he foresaw, so urgently, that, the case being taken into consideration by his lordship and the council, they return’d him with a full commission to enter upon the castle called Barry-Court, with all other lands of the said Barry ; and to reduce him to peace and subjection, by such means as he judg’d most feasible ; appointing him for his farther enablement a party of horse. In the interim, such measures were used with those in authority at Cork, that the commission proved of little effect ; but though the said estate of Barry-More, was made over to the mother of David Barry, and only rented to the son ; and though it was his principal seat ; yet partly in fear of that commission, partly through spite and indignation, he burnt the castle himself to the ground, and wasted the country about it with greater outrage and destruction, than his enemies, had they taken it, would have done. Moreover, as Raleigh was on his journey back to his quarters, an old rebel of Barry’s faction, named Fitz-Edmonds, who was seneschal of Imokelly, lay in wait to set upon and seize him, with a party of horse and some Kerns, at a ford through which he was to pass between Yongall and Cork : some historians call the place Corabby.<sup>g</sup> Raleigh was much inferior in number, being, at his setting out, accompanied but with six men, and they scatter'd behind when he approach'd the ford. Here Fitz-Edmonds and his crew fallied from their ambuscade; and cross'd him, to oppose his passage, whom Raleigh manfully encounter'd and defeated, or at least broke through them, so that he got clear over the river :<sup>a</sup> but one of his company, Mr. Henry Moyle, following, either took a part too deep and unfordable, or plung'd into a quick-spring; or his horse, otherwise foundering, threw him down in the middle of it; where, between fear of drowning and being taken by the enemies, he called out to Raleigh for help; who, tho' he had escap'd both dangers, yet incurred them again to save his companion's life: but Moyle, in haste and confusion remounting, over-leap'd his horse, and fell down on the other side into a deep mire, where he might have been stifled, had not Raleigh recover'd him a second time, and brought him safe to land; but his horse run over to the rebels.<sup>b</sup> Raleigh waited on the opposite bank, with his staff<sup>c</sup> in one hand, and a pistol in the other; for the rest of his company who were yet to cross the river; among whom was his servant Jenkin, who had two hundred pounds of his money in charge; a sum in those days enough to make a soldier of fortune in these circumstances look about him; especially now the seneschal had got a recruit of twelve men, and was in all above twenty strong against him. Yet this hero, as his party called him, when he beheld Raleigh stand his ground, and the rest of his company advance, whom he possibly thought might be of greater number than they were, only exchanged a few rough words with him, and thought it best to offer no further molestation. Not long after, there being a parley between the earl of Ormond and the rebels, where the seneschal beginning to vaunt of his own exploits, Raleigh, who was present, charg'd him openly with flat cowardise, as having lately twenty to one on his side, and durst not encounter him alone. One of the rebels own comrades pretended an unwonted diffidence in their champion upon that rencounter; but gave confident assurances he would never be so remiss again upon any like occasion. This so chaff'd the earl of Ormond, that he challeng'd the seneschal, with Sir John Desmond, and any four they would nominate, to meet himself, captain Raleigh, and four more whom they would bring, at the place aforesaid; where they would pass the great river to them, and there, two to two, four to four, or six to six, fight and determine the point in debate between them; but no answer was then return'd: wherefore the white knight, named Fitz-Gibbon, was afterwards sent to him with a repetition of the challenge; but the rebels then absolutely refused it. Soon after the earl of Ormond departed from his long and wearisome services here to England, about the spring of the year 1581. His government of Munster was given to captain Raleigh, in commission with Sir William Morgan and captain Piers. Raleigh lay for the most part at Lismore; and, in the country and woods thereabouts, spent all this summer in continual action against the rebels.<sup>c</sup>

THEN Raleigh remov'd with his little band of fourscore foot and eight horse, to his old quarters at Cork; but receiving intelligence by the way, that the arch-traitor Barry was at Glove, with several hundred men, he resolv'd to pass through that town, and offer him the combat. Accordingly at the town's end he met Barry and his forces, whom Raleigh charged with great bravery, and put him to flight. As he pursued his journey, he overtook another company of the enemy in a plain, by a wood-side; upon whom, having only six horse-men with him, expecting probably his company would soon join him, he gave the onset; but the rebels, who were in much greater number, being cut off from the wood, and having no other relief, faced about, and fought very desperately, killing five of the horses belonging to Raleigh's company, whereof his own was one, and he himself very near being over-borne by the numbers upon him, had not his trusty servant Nicholas Wright, a Yorkshire man, interpos'd; who perceiving his master's horse so mortally wounded with darts, and plunging past all recovery, encounter'd six of the enemy at once, and killed one of them; while another of his fellow-servants, named Patrick Fagaw, rescued Raleigh; which had been so unsuccessfully attempted by James Fitz-Richard and his kern, both of Raleigh's company, that the man was slain, and the master very near the same fate; whereupon Raleigh would not suffer Wright to fight by him any longer, but order'd him to charge above-hand, and save the gentleman: at which command he rush'd into the throng of the enemy, dispatch'd the antagonist who press'd foremost upon Mr. Fitz-Richard, and rescued him. In this sharp skirmish, there were many of the rebels slain, and two taken prisoners, whom Raleigh carried with him to Cork; and while he lay here, he performed several other notable services, which deserve (says my author Hooker) to be for ever register'd.<sup>d</sup>

Seizes lord Roch in his own castle.

AMONG the rest, his excellent conduct in the seizure of the lord Roch is more particularly remember'd and applauded. This nobleman, being much suspected to hold confederacy with some of the chief rebels, Raleigh undertook to bring, with his family, before the earl of Ormond at Cork. But the design of this hazardous surprise took air among the enemy, and a party of eight hundred men, under Fitz-Edmonds and Barry, were gather'd to way-lay the English either going or coming. However Raleigh, knowing the lord Roch to be a powerful and popular man among the Irish, so suddenly commanded all his company to be in readiness by eleven a-clock that night, and they were so punctual to the hour, that he directly marched away to Bally in Harsh, which was Roch's seat, about twenty miles from Cork, and escaped the ambuscade. He arrived there by break of day; but the townsmen were so alarmed, that they soon gather'd five hundred strong. Raleigh drew up, and in such manner bestowed his men in the town it self, that he soon quell'd and restrain'd the people there; then selecting half a dozen out of his company, among whom were Arthur Barlow, hereafter to be spoken of, with Nicholas Wright before-mention'd; and having appointed another little party to follow him, he marched up to the castle. He was met by three or four of Roch's gentlemen, of whom he desir'd to speak with their lord; which was agreed to, on condition he would dismiss three or four of his own attendants; to which, with apparent readiness, he comply'd; but so contriv'd, that none of them were lock'd out. Then he gave them directions which way the rest also, without the gates, might be admitted, whilst he should hold the lord Roch in discourse; which succeeded so happily, that by degrees his whole complement were got within the court-yard; some guarding the gates, others watching in the hall, each having his piece loaden with a brace of balls. The lord Roch was amaz'd and terrify'd at so silent and insensible a seizure; but, dissembling his uneasiness, he would needs have Raleigh, and the gentlemen with him, participate of his plentiful table: yet the policy of his hospitality did not defeat that of their enterprise; for, as soon as the dinner was over, Raleigh ingenuously laid open the occasion of his visit. Lord Roch made many excuses, and in the end absolutely refused to go along with him. But when the commission was produced, and he found Raleigh inflexible, he chose to do that by consent, which he found he must do by compulsion. Then Raleigh urged him to oblige his townsmen likewise, who had so faithfully risen for his defence in his neighbourhood, to escort and defend him in his journey; to which lord Roch also consented, professing he doubted not but to clear himself of whatever allegations should be laid to his charge. When his lordship, with his lady and attendance, had made themselves ready, Raleigh was for another nocturnal progress; but though the night fell out so very dark and tempestuous, and the ways were so full of hills and dales, rocks and precipices, that many of his soldiers were much bruised by falls, and one of them so mortify'd, that he lost his life in the march; yet the veil wherewith the rest were shelter'd, by that obscurity, from the more dangerous ambuscades of their enemy, who had every-where bestrew'd the passages to intercept them, made such sufficient compensation for those disasters, that by the next morning early he safely presented his prisoners to the general; not without raising an universal astonishment at his dexterous evasion of so many perils. But the lord Roch, upon examination, did make his words good; for being honourably acquitted, he approved himself a faithful subject ever after, and three of his sons laid down their lives in her majesty's service.<sup>a</sup>

governor of Cork.

IN the month of August, the same year, the lord deputy made the aforesaid captain John Zouch governor of Munster, with whom Raleigh and Dowdal made several journeys to settle and compose the country; but the certain place of their residence was at Cork. And when Zouch, with Dowdal, made that secret expedition, in which he lopp'd off the third branch of this venomous hydra, Sir John Desmond; whose body was hung by the heels on a gibbet, then fix'd on the gates of that city, and his head sent to London: he left the government of Cork to Raleigh.<sup>b</sup> I have observ'd this service against that Sir John Desmond to have been commemorated by Raleigh himself in honour of Zouch, though in a discourse on a different subject, and some years after his death;<sup>c</sup> for soon after his return with the lord deputy into England, he was kill'd in a duel by one of his intimate friends: and this I remark here, as somewhat disproving the insinuation that Zouch's superior preferment should have nourished any such discontent in Raleigh,<sup>d</sup> as might occasion that dispute we shall hear of between him and the lord deputy afterwards in England. Nor can I impute it to the disbanding his company, which might happen about this time; it seeming reasonable, upon the silence of the earl of Desmond, the slaughter of his brothers, and the submission Barry had newly made, that the deputy, thinking Munster was now growing quiet, should not only lessen the queen's expences there, by cashiering several companies, and discharging many garrisons, which he did, so as to have for the whole service of that province, only four hundred foot and fifty horse; but that in the command of these, the senior officers should be continued. However it was, Raleigh appears no longer, after this reduction, in the wars of Ireland: but how well his services were received by the queen, and how nobly she rewarded him for them after the earl of Desmond himself was slain, we shall hear when we arrive at the time that his large possessions came to be divided among those who had assisted in quenching the flames of his rebellion.

RALEGH was not long in England, before his relation in some degree to the court began to appear. Tradition has industriously ascrib'd his first introduction thither to a piece of gallantry, wherewith he surpris'd the queen accidentally in one of her walks. "Her majesty meeting (says my author) with a plashy place, made some scruple to go on; when Raleigh (dressed in the gay and genteel habit of those times) presently cast off and spread his new plush cloak on the ground, whereon the queen trod gently over, rewarding him afterwards with many suits for his so free and seasonable tender of so fair a foot-cloth: thus an advantageous admission (says he) into the notice of a prince, is more than half a degree to preferment." <sup>a</sup> After this, as the same author tells us, Raleigh coming to court, and finding some hopes of the queen's favour reflecting upon him, he wrote in a glass window, obvious to her eye,

Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall

UNDER which her majesty soon after wrote,

If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all.

No romantic air, that may appear in these passages, has been able to deny them a recital by several serious authors: and indeed readers of experience, knowing how often an unusual compliment, or artificial bait for favour, catches it, before the most substantial services, will not only be apt to doubt whether such incidents are to be call'd accessories, so much as principals in worldly promotion; but esteem those as the most instructive circumstances in the lives of great men, which display the foot-steps of their advancement; and how they first fell into the track of distinction: for the acquisition of glory is like that of riches; the profound mystery lies in coming at the prime stock; an ordinary prudence will increase it.

BUT though he always made a very elegant appearance, as well in the splendor of attire, as the politeness of address; "having a good presence, in a handsome and well compacted person; a strong natural wit, and a better judgment; with a bold and plausible tongue, whereby he could set out his parts to the best advantage;" <sup>b</sup> all very engaging advocates for royal favour, especially in a female sovereign: yet, observing Raleigh had, at this time, render'd himself considerable enough by his actions; and that the queen was not wanting in due notice towards such as were of a publick nature; I should think these, of a more private and particular nature, might be accounted only as concurrent causes of his favourable reception at court; and especially seeing others, about the same time offering, sufficient of themselves to establish him there: but be that as it may, we find him, upon his return into England, employ'd in an expedition or two, by authority belike from the court; they being upon occasions of state. And though it imports not much whether it was now, or before he was in Ireland, that he accompanied the French ambassador, Monsieur Simier, among those gentlemen who were appointed for his safe convoy to France: yet if that ambassador return'd home, when his master the duke of Anjou came last over in November, the year before-named, this is the place for it to be mention'd in. That Simier was, it seems, a proper advocate for the cause he came to plead; skill'd in all the insinuating arts and devices of amorous address, and thereby perhaps won more of the queen's attention to his master's suit, than sat easy upon the earl of Leicester's mind: for though this earl was now privately married to the late earl of Effex's widow, yet his prejudice might at this time be renewed against the ambassador, for procuring him the queen's displeasure, by discovering that marriage; as it was at first created, by supplanting him in his higher hopes. Indeed, the earl's animosity is said to have extended to the hiring of bravo's to assassinate the ambassador; and Camden, who relates thus much, assures us the queen publish'd (about two years before this time) a proclamation, commanding that no man should offer any affront to Simier, or any of his attendants: <sup>c</sup> nay, if we will believe a certain collection of most flagrant accusations against that earl, to which Camden, who seldom spares him, has paid much credit; the land it self was no boundary to the earl's revenge: for when other attempts fail'd, he is said, among those accusations, to have "dealt with certain Flushingers, and other pirates, to sink the ambassador "at sea, with the English gentlemen, his favourers, who accompanied him at his return into "France; and though they missed of this practice also (as not daring to set upon him for "fear of her majesty's ships; which, to break this design, attended by special command, to "waft him over in safety;) yet the foresaid English gentlemen were holden four hours in chase "at their coming back, as Master Raleigh well knoweth (says my author) being then pre- "sent; and two of the chafers, named Clark and Harris, confessed afterwards the whole de- "signment."

And the duke of Anjou to Antwerp.

BUT after the duke of Anjou himself had been three months in England, he also departed to take upon him the government of the Netherlands. This departure was in February follow- ing; and though the queen seems to have declin'd the marriage with him, principally because she found her ministry so averse to it; yet there was an author, and his printer, who, for ha- ving published a little treatise against it about two years before,<sup>b</sup> had their hands cut off but a few days after the duke came to London.<sup>c</sup> And she shew'd him many other marks of favour and distinction; particularly, when he left the kingdom, she bore him company in person to Dover, and having appointed a most splendid retinue of nobles and gentlemen to wait upon him to his new government; I find that Raleigh was also among this grand assembly. They attended the duke to Antwerp, where, making a most magnificent procession, he was created duke of Brabant, &c. and invested with his charge. Raleigh seems not only to have staid there some time after the lord admiral Howard, Leicester, young Sidney, and the rest were re- turn'd; but, through the opportunity of being personally known to the prince of Orange, ho- nour'd with some special acknowledgments from him to the queen of England. And Raleigh mentions thus much himself, in a discourse he wrote many years afterwards; wherein, speaking of the Hollanders flourishing state, he lays down, as the first cause thereof, the favour and as- sistance granted them by this crown; "which, says he, the late worthy and famous prince of "Orange did always acknowledge: and in the year 1582, when I took my leave of him at "Antwerp, after the return of the earl of Leicester into England, and Monseigneur's arrival there; "when he delivered me his letters to her majesty, he pray'd me to say to the queen, from "him, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protegemur: for certainly (says he) they had wither'd in "the bud, and sunk in the beginning of their navigation, had not her majesty assisted them."<sup>d</sup>

with the lord Grey, reckon'd among the causes of his preferment.

TOWARDS the end of August, this last mention'd year, the lord Grey resign'd the sword of Ire- land, after he had been two years deputy in that kingdom:<sup>e</sup> and this must be the time, that dispute between him and Raleigh was brought to a hearing, of which authors have so blindly written. Sir Robert Naunton "is confident, that among the second causes of Raleigh's growth (not de- "nying, or rather acquiescing in his actions and accomplishments to have been the first) "that variance between him and the lord Grey, in his descent into Ireland, was a principal; "for it drew them both over (says he) to the council-table, there to plead their cause; where " (what advantage he had in the cause, my said author knew not, but says) he had much the "better in telling of his tale; and so much, that the queen and the lords took no slight mark "of the man and his parts; for from thence he came to be known, and to have access to "the queen and the lords."<sup>f</sup> Now if this author is so defective, as not to have known the cause or subject of their quarrel; or, that Raleigh, leaving Ireland long before the lord Grey, was not likely to be drawn over together with him to the council-table; how much more must those writers following him be so, who have confus'd this matter with several other particulars; though they seem to have had no other authority? One of them says, Raleigh had in deed, but not in truth, the better by the tongue;<sup>g</sup> and insinuates (with great caution and delicacy he thought, no doubt) that the queen had been told something so engaging of Raleigh, besides his advantage in pleading, that it was not to be mention'd; <sup>h</sup> as if any of her courtiers dared

Id. p. 75. I cannot be sure this is the style of a reverend father in God, tho' Mr. Tindal, in his notes upon Rapin, would in- duce us to think so, in calling the author of this Au- licus Coquinarius, by the name of Goodman, who was bishop of Gloucester, and did indeed write a reuerce of Sir Anthony Weldon's court and character of king James; which reuerce is said by Anthony Wood to be in- volv'd in this Aulic. Coquinarius; but the reuerce it self, written in a thin Folio, and sometimes quoted by H. Foulis, in his Romish treasuries, remains still in MS. in the Bodleian library, and begins differently from this printed answer to that court and character.

to say any thing to the queen's face, which this anonymous writer, near fifty years after her death, would be either ashamed or afraid to repeat. A later writer makes such distinctions of Raleigh's extraordinary behaviour in this dispute, as if he had been at the council-table, and seen as well as heard him.<sup>a</sup> And another, after them all, has found out the cause of this difference between them to be captain Zouch's preferment;<sup>b</sup> of which we have before spoken, as improbable. But passing these over, our author Naunton goes on; and tho' he does not determine, whether the lord Leicester had then cast in a good word for Raleigh to the queen; yet says "it is true, that he had gotten the queen's ear at a trice, and she began to be taken with his elocution, and loved to hear his reasons to her demands: and the truth is, she took him for a kind of oracle, which nettled them all; yea, those he relied on, began to take this his sudden favour for an alarm; to be sensible of their own supplantation, and to project his; which made him shortly after sing, Fortune my foe, &c."

It is hinted to us somewhat more expressly, by another court-writer of those times, and that's a rarity, such being commonly too polite or political to be very obliging in historical particulars; that the earl of Leicester befriended Raleigh (perhaps through his friendship with young Sidney, that earl's worthily beloved nephew) in his first advancements at court; and that being willing, for his own ease, to bestow handsomely upon another some part of the pains, and perhaps of the envy, to which a long indulgent fortune is obnoxious, either brought, or let him into that promising sphere of preferment; where the earl soon found him such an apprentice, as knew well enough how to set up for himself, says my said author.<sup>c</sup> So that if the earl of Suffex, who was Leicester's antagonist, had any hand in Raleigh's rise, as some later writers of less authority have suggested,<sup>d</sup> it seems to have been afterwards, when Raleigh's courtly splendor was, by occasion, somewhat obstructed; and Leicester meant to allay it, by interposing the young earl of Effex: for Raleigh continued, during that storm, in some lustre of a favour'd man, like billows which sink but by degrees, even when the wind is down that first stirr'd them. But this we shall observe as we go on, that in all the different aspects or conjunctions of interest, through the access or change of new favourites in this long reign, none were less emerg'd by the smiles of the court, in the luxuries and vanities of it, nor more animated by its frowns to the enterprising of publick and superior difficulties for the honour and aggrandisement of his country. Not that he set out to sea, but when he had despaired of raising himself on shore: for these publick enterprises were rooted so early in Raleigh's aspiring mind, that we perceive, even now, before factions at court could drive him from the land, or preferments and grants from the crown enable him for the sea; that he had built at his own expence, to prosecute them, a strong handsome ship, which was named Bark Raleigh, of two hundred ton burden.

AND now that the six years period of Sir Humphrey Gilbert's patent grew short, four of them being elaps'd, he thought it high time to make a new attempt in person (since his assignments had proved of little consequence) at those discoveries he had before fail'd in, that he might confirm by experience what he had so excellently advanced in theory. Accordingly, having fitted out a fleet of four ships, Raleigh also victuall'd, and mann'd out his before-mention'd, which was the largest among them; and, in the quality of vice-admiral, set out to bear his brother Gilbert's company, in this his last expedition to Newfoundland. The fleet departed from Plymouth on the 11th of June 1583. My author, who was in this voyage, tells us, no cost was spared by Raleigh in provisions and necessaries for the happy accomplishment of it; yet that in two or three days following he return'd greatly distress'd to Plymouth, by reason his whole ship's company was infected with a contagious sickness.<sup>e</sup> But lucky to him, perhaps, was this visitation; since the voyage proved so fatal to those who went through it, particularly Sir Humphrey himself; who, tho' he arrived in Newfoundland in the beginning of August following; took possession of the country in right of the crown of England, by digging up a turf, <sup>a</sup> David Lloyd says, Raleigh, upon this occasion, stated his case with that clearness; urg'd his arguments with that evidence and reason; offer'd his apologies with those pertinent and taking allegations, and his replies with that maturity; express'd himself with that fluency and eloquence, and manag'd his carriage and countenance with that discretion, that he was, first, the statesman's observation; next, her majesty's favourite; and at last, her oracle. See this author's Observations on the statesmen and favourites of England since the Reformation, Octob. 1665. p. 487.

and there decided in Raleigh's favour: the soliciting of which business was the true cause of his leaving Ireland. But he quotes no authority; and I think by what is before said of the matter, this true cause will appear a groundless conjecture; at least less probable, than what might perhaps be drawn from Spenser's View of Ireland, vol. 6. p. 1609.

and receiving it with a hasel wand, deliver'd to him according to our law and custom; also had assign'd lands to every man in his company, and was got three hundred leagues in his way home again, with full hopes of the queen's assistance to fit out a fleet not only for the north, but one also for the south next year; yet over-hardily venturing in a little frigate of but ten ton burden, called the Squirrel; he was on the ninth of September following at midnight, in a high sea, swallowed up.<sup>a</sup> Another of the vessels, called the Delight, but few days before also suffer'd the same fate; and even the rest return'd not without great hazard, hardship, and loss: teaching (says Camden) that it is a more difficult matter to carry over colonies to remote countries upon private men's purses, than he and others had persuaded themselves, to their own loss and detriment:<sup>b</sup> but neither these unfortunate attempts by sea hitherto, nor the ruin of Sir Humphrey Gilbert's estate, nor the loss of his life, nor the hardships of all his company besides, could teach Raleigh that lesson: these examples and this experience were so far from satiating, that they did but sharpen his appetite to such honourable dangers.

AND as we are assur'd from family tradition, by a late author of his own name and lineage, that the discoveries of the great Columbus, the conquests of Fernando Cortez, the famous Francis Pizarro, and other leaders of the Spaniards, who under the emperor Charles and his son Philip II, had made the greatest and most surprising additions to their empire that ever prince received, or subjects wrought, were the favourite histories that took up Raleigh's early reading and conversation while he was but a young man;<sup>c</sup> we may presume they so possess'd his noble genius (with perhaps also some late domestic and living examples) that no little personal oppositions at home, or particular misadventures abroad, could ever discourage him from the pursuit of these grand and national undertakings. But when, by his own observation, he found the Spaniards had only settled upon the middle and southern parts of America, and that there were certain vast territories yet unknown to the north of those lands, which the Spaniards already enjoy'd, as fit perhaps for settlement, and as easy to conquer, as any they did enjoy: and when, by his enquiries, among the most observant pilots and mariners who had sailed in the Spanish ships to the gulph of Mexico, many of whom he had opportunity to meet and discourse with in Holland and Flanders, he had learnt that the Spaniards always went into the gulph of Mexico by St. Domingo and the island of Hispaniola, where the currents with the trade-winds always ran together, and set into the bay; that they always disembogu'd, as they call'd it, or came out by the Havana and the channels of Bahama, which they now call the gulph of Florida; and that, as they return'd by this gulph, they found a continued coast on the west-side trending away north, which they generally lost sight of by standing away to the east, to make for the coast of Spain; Raleigh fully determin'd that there was a vast extent of land north of that gulph, or west from the coast of Spain, which might be well worth discovering; and, after mature deliberation, fully resolv'd upon the discovery. As soon as he had digested his proposal, and display'd the manner of prosecuting it in proper schemes, he laid them before the queen and council, to whom it appearing a rational, practical, and generous undertaking, her majesty

make the degrees of longitude in every latitude of equal bigness; and invented a spherical instrument, with a compass of variation, for the perfect knowledge of the longitude; and laid down a precise order to prick the sea-cards, with certain rules for the shortning any discovery, and knowing at the first entrance of any fret, whether it lies open to the ocean more ways than one, and how far the sea stretches itself into the land. As for the picture at Compton, said by Prince to be drawn for Sir H. Gilbert; if his author, Sir W. Pole, is no truer in his assertion of the queen's having given Sir Humphrey the gold chain represented about the neck thereof, than he was in her having knighted him, and there are no other signatures besides that chain, and the inscription of virginia on the globe, with the verses under it relating thereto; I see not but the picture is to be doubted, as rather meant for his brother Raleigh, who was honoured with a golden chain by the queen, and whose title to that inscription on the globe was beyond any man's in the world. But the stately poem in Latin Hexameters, upon his last expedition, by Stephanus Parmenius Budeus, a learned Hungarian, who was drown'd with him, was undoubtedly, among other English adventurers therein nam'd, chiefly intended for his honour. See it in Hakluyt, vol. 3. p. 138.

In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patents, at Westminster the 25th of March, in the 26th year of our reign.”

IMMEDIATELY upon the grant of this patent, Raleigh gave his instructions for an American voyage<sup>b</sup> to captain Philip Amadas and captain Arthur Barlow, two experienced commanders, and had got a couple of barks well furnish’d with men and provisions at his own expence, in such readiness, that on the twenty-seventh day of April following they departed from the west of England. The tenth of May they arrived at the Canaries, and a month after fell upon the isles of the West-Indies “ which, with the rest adjoining (says my author, one of those captains) are so well known to your self (directing the account of this voyage to his prior) and to many others, that I will not trouble you with the remembrance of them.” In the beginning of July they were saluted with a most fragrant gale from the land they were seeking, and soon after arrived upon the coast; but sail’d along some six-score miles before they could find an entrance by any river issuing into the sea. At last, discovering one, they mann’d out their boats to view the land adjoining, where they saw vines laden with grapes in vast abundance, climbing up the tall cedars, and spreading so luxuriantly along the sandy shore, that the sea often over-flowed them. On the thirteenth of July they took possession in right of the queen, and afterwards deliver’d the country over to Raleigh’s use. They thought this land had at first been the continent, but found it afterwards only an island twenty miles long, called Wocoken; plentifully stock’d with animals, groves of sweet-smelling trees, pulse, grain, and esculent roots. They observ’d along the coast, a tract of islands two or three hundred miles long; and passing between them, saw another great sea, twenty, forty, and in some places fifty miles over, before they could reach the continent; and in this inclosed sea above a hundred islands of various size, whereof one is sixteen miles long, called Roanoak, and about seven leagues distant, up the river Occam, from the harbour they first enter’d; at which they chiefly settled while they stay’d, finding it so pleasant and fruitful as to yield three harvests in five months. But they remain’d upon the borders of Wocoken two days before they beheld a human creature; on the third, they saw a boat rowing towards them with three of the natives; one of them landed, and walk’d up the shore near their ship, for they were then on board; then the two captains, with some others, took their boat and row’d to land, and by their courteous carriage, soon prevail’d on the native to return with them on board, where they cloathed him, and gave him victuals, wine, and several little toys or utensils, which won the simple creature’s heart. Soon after his departure, he return’d again with a boat full of fish, to be divided between the ship and the pinnace, and then he left them. The next day came the king’s brother Granganimeo, with a great many attendants; for the king himself, who was named Wingina, and his large territories Wingandacoa, lay ill of the wounds he had lately receiv’d in war. His brother was highly pleas’d with his entertainment, and having received several presents, soon after sent the savages to traffick with the English; also came again himself, and exchange’d twenty skins, worth as many nobles, for a tin dish, which he hung as a gorget about his neck, to defend him from the arrows of his enemies: then also he brought his wife and children, with her attendants, forty or fifty in number. She was well-favour’d, but bashful, clad in a mantle of deer-skin, lin’d with fur, and a kind of apron of the same, her hair hung down long on each side, with a band of white coral about her forehead, and long bracelets of pearl down to her middle, as big as pease in her ears, a bracelet whereof, we deliver’d to your worship, says my author to Raleigh. Her husband’s apparel was much like hers, only about his head he wore a broad plate of gold or copper, and his hair was long but on one side. After this interview, familiar commerce pass’d between the natives and the English, who, when they went to Roanoak, were much carol’d and treated by the lady aforesaid. And when she could not prevail with them to stay, being but few in company, tho' the natives had no edge-tools of iron or steel, and had prof-fer'd a great box of pearl for some armour and a sword, she sent her women to watch them all night in their ships on the bank-side. And indeed all the people, who saw them, admir'd much at their ships, their fire-arms, their cloaths, and above all, their complexions; for, except a vessel which was cast away with some christian adventurers about twenty-six years before near Secotan, the southermost town in Wingandacoa, never any people in apparel, or of fair colour were seen or heard of among them; which made them wonder so much at the whiteness of their skins, and so fond of seeing and touching them. Under these favourable recommendations, and the distress which the natives were in for some powerful friends to defend them from the inva-sions of their neighbours, the promises of visiting them again, wherewith the English left them, after having learnt as much of the situation, state, and product of the country, as was at this time convenient, were very acceptable. So bringing over a couple of the Indians with them, named Manteo and Wanchese, to shew them our fine country, they arriv'd safely in the west of England about the middle of September following. Then captain Barlow address'd the relation of this first voyage, and his success in it, to his proprietor, whereof I have thus given an abstract. <sup>a</sup>

WHEN Raleigh had laid before her majesty these and all other reports most worthy of notice, which were brought him of this rich, beautiful, and virgin country; and had acknowledg'd how much this hopeful progress towards the possession of it was owing to the auspices of a virgin queen; she was so well pleas'd with the honour and advantage it promis'd, and gave him such encouragement to compleat the discovery, which he forthwith prepar'd to do by another expedition, that she call'd it her self by the name of VIRGINIA.<sup>b</sup> What enemies this publick patronage might raise him at court, we hear not; but find he had such friends in the country, that upon the approaching sessions of parliament, about two months after, he was elected a knight of the shire for the county of Devon, Sir William Courtenay being the other representative.<sup>c</sup> There was then a clerk of the parliament so very indolent, or otherwise indispos'd, that the transactions of the house of commons at this time were very imperfectly recorded.<sup>d</sup> Yet we find Raleigh mention'd to have been chosen of the committees upon some bills that were then read. On the fourteenth of December following, the bill, in confirmation of his pa-tent aforeaid for the discovery of foreign countries, was read the first time. In the afternoon it was read the second time, and committed to the vice-chamberlain Hatton, secretary Walsingham, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Richard Greenfield (or Grenvill) Sir William Courtenay, Sir William Mobun, and others. Three days after the said bill was, without any alteration, order'd to be engross'd. The next day it was read the third time, when, after many arguments and a proviso added, it pass'd the house upon the question.<sup>e</sup> Between this time in December and the twenty-fourth of February following he receiv'd the honour of knighthood; for being then in a committee for considering after what manner and measure they should supply her ma-jesty by subsidy: this is the earliest time I meet with of his being styl'd Sir Walter Raleigh; <sup>f</sup> a title which her majesty bestow'd, as all others of honour, with frugality and choice. There-fore was it a more certain cognizance of virtue or valour, than titles of more pompous denomi-nation in the reign of her successor, who suffer'd lucre to corrupt the noble fountain, to turn it into vulgar channels, and drain it even to the dregs; <sup>g</sup> so that the dignities which flowed or overflowed from it, proved distinctions oftener of their pride, riches, or prostitutions, on whom they were conferr'd, than of any abilities or performances for the publick good that might de-serve them. Nay, that this honour was intended by that queen as the most significant testimony of personal desert, may be instanced, according to an ingenious observer of her reign, "in " Sir Francis Vere, a man nobly descended; and Sir Walter Raleigh, exactly qualify'd, says he,

His patent for wine-licences.

His controversy with the university of Cambridge.

ABOUT the time that her majesty granted Raleigh the patent above-cited for the discovery of remote countries, she seems also to have given him another to license the vending of wines throughout the kingdom, that by the advantages of this, he might be better able to sustain the great charges which the other brought upon him. There were no restrictions belike in this patent from increasing the number of vintners in any part of the realm. And hence arose his controversy at this time with one of the universities. For Raleigh having by virtue of that general patent given licence to one John Keymer to sell wine in Cambridge, some of the hotter heads, especially the other vintners there, among whom was one Baxter, a squire beadle, licensed to sell wine by that university, opposed this Keymer and his wife with such violence, that she was likely to have died. Complaint being made to Raleigh, he wrote a letter to The worshipful Dr. Howland, vice-chancellor, and the rest of the masters, to tell them how much he took this riotous demeanor as a contempt of the queen’s grant to him ; presuming, if he had given any unlawful privilege, the conference he had offer’d, by his deputies, for a quiet decision of the matter by learned council between them, would have been accepted. Further telling them, that if the abuse was not regulated, and the said Keymer permitted to enjoy the liberty granted him, he would take some other course for reformation therein ; but resting assured they would use such means as might occasion no further trouble, he not desiring to execute his grant to its extent among their vintners, who were the only disturbers herein, respecting more their own gain than quiet government ; he only craves their answer, and that the riotous persons might not rest unpunished : so bids them heartily farewell ; from his lodgings at the court the 9th of July 1584 ; and subscribes himself Your very affectionate loving friend. This producing no answer in seven months, and Raleigh having heard they continued to oppress Keymer ; he wrote, by him, again ; To his loving friend the vice-chancellor, &c. telling him, that being by information perswaded, himself, with the grave and well-disposed of the university, were so grieved with the unseemly outrages lately committed by the young and unbridled heads thereof, to the contempt of the queen’s prerogative and his discredit, as sufficient order had been taken for the bearer’s quiet ; which caused him to rest from requiring reformation therein at his good lord-treasurer’s hands ; who as yet understood nothing from him of these riots, through the good-will he bore to their university : and that he meant so to deal with them for the other four taverns, as should sufficiently have contented them. But his too favourable dealing with them had given such encouragement, as, this day, he is inform’d, that, intending further to disturb the bearer, they had warned him to appear before them ; with which he had perswaded him to comply ; for tho’ he knew them not, their place should tell him, their proceedings would be just and lawful ; which only he desired, and wherein they would pleasure themselves, and continue his readiness to serve them. Thus hoping to find by their answer, these informations sprung rather from jealousy than just occasion, he leaves them to God ; from the court at Somerſet-House the 10th of February in the year aforesaid, and subscribes himself Your very willing friend. Upon their sending no answer to this, and Raleigh hearing they had suddenly clapp’d up the man in prison, he sent ten days after the last, his third letter from the court, directed To the vice-chancellor, and the rest of the masters, &c. And herein tells them, he cannot a little marvel at their peremptory and proud manner of dealing. That he was content to use all manner of courtesy towards them in respect of his honourable good lord the lord-treasurer ; but perceived his reasonable, or rather too submissive dealing, had bred in them a proceeding unsufferable ; having committed a poor man to prison, for doing nothing but what was warranted by the great seal of England ; which, supposing they had a charter, he knew not that any man or society would so much take upon them to do, before a trial. As I reverence the place, says he, of which you are the governors, so I will not willingly take any wrong or disgrace from you. But as he was assur’d the lord-treasurer would be indifferent in the case, and as the matter so much concern’d the validity of his patent elsewhere, as well as in their university, he would try the utmost of his right as well for this one, wherewith he was content to have been satisfy’d, as for all the other four. So having thought they would have vouchsafed him an answer to his last letters, he ends, subscribing himself Your friend, as you shall give cause.<sup>b</sup> This rous’d them to some consideration, and soon after, a handsome apologetical letter was sent from the vice-chancellor to Sir W. Raleigh, setting forth, that the hard opinion he had conceived of them for this matter, made them doubt what manner of answer they might address to him without offence; and that their silence was so ill taken; they knew not how their endeavours to excuse it might give him satisfaction. That they had not neglected any reasonable means to procure his favour for the quiet enjoyment of that whereof they had the fruition for above two hundred years; nor omitted to become petitioners to him in a very humble manner. That his counsel had not made any just exception against their charters; and those who had the hearing of the case, thought them to have the better warrant. Yet that he used such hard terms, as they little look'd for at his hands; "being by birth a gentleman; "by education train'd up to the knowledge of good letters; instructed with the liberal disposition of a university, the fountain and nursery of all humanity: and further, by God's good blessing, advanc'd in court, from whence the very name of courtesy is drawn." That the prejudice he apprehended from their example against his patent, was unlikely to fall out; since other places were not privileg'd as the universities were. That her majesty's grant, by her prerogative, gave him his title; and the like prerogative was the ground of their charters. And as he would think it hard to have his patent impeach'd by an after-grant, they hoped he would with like equity measure them, who were warranted to have the sole dealing with all vintners in Cambridge town, and the precincts thereof. Touching the imprisonment of the party, whom he charged them with proceeding against before trial; and who, according to Mr. Brown's promise to the lord-treasurer, was to have given over at Michaelmas last; however the course thereof had been otherwise reported to him, it was only at this time to correct his contempt in not appearing, being lawfully warned, and refusing to answer before the ordinary judge, or enter bond for appearance when cause should require. That for their own part, it would be no disadvantage whether he or other, one or many, were vintners there; but in regard of the youth committed to their charge, duty bound them to consider who they admitted to keep taverns, the number whereof also was limited; which, if they exceeded, would endanger their privileges; for the preservation whereof as they had all taken a special oath, so they right humbly estfoons beseech'd him to have regard of them for their duties therein. Concluding thus; "What-ever kindness you shall any ways shew to the university; As the body thereof doth still continue, so the memory thereof cannot decay. There is not one of us, but you may readily command wherein it may please you to employ us; only we pray you, and that in the heartiest manner, to vouchsafe us your favour in matter of our privileges; That we may leave them in no worse estate to our posterity, than we did receive them of our predecessors. Thus desiring God so to direct you with his blessed spirit, as may be most to his glory, and your greatest comfort, we take our leave; from Cambridge." <sup>a</sup> This might probably pacify Raleigh at present, both for their neglect in not answering his letters, and their forwardness in imprisoning the man; till the difference was a few months afterwards accommodated by the lord-treasurer, who was chancellor of that university. <sup>b</sup>

AND indeed at this juncture Raleigh seems to have had little leisure for further debates of this kind: for the parliament being soon after, on the 29th of March 1585, prorogued, Raleigh appears several ways engag'd in the laudable improvements of navigation. For his brother Adrian Gilbert of Sandridge, afterwards knighted, in pursuance of the arguments laid down by his brother Sir Humphrey, having been at great charges in finding out the northern passage to China and the Moluccas; and in consideration thereof been granted a patent by the queen two years before this time, to pursue the discovery by partners, under the title of The colleagues of the fellowship for the discovery of the north-west passage; Raleigh was now one of the associates in this enterprize; and after having duly consulted about the likeliest means to success, and liberally contributed towards the expence, they chose captain John Davis, an experienc'd navigator, to be undertaker of the exploit. He set first out upon it this summer from Falmouth in two barks. When he came to land in sixty-six degrees forty minutes latitude, he anchor'd in a

<sup>b</sup> For the said lord treasurer Burghley sent, in a letter to Dr. Norgate, his vice-chancellor, on the 26th of July 1585, the opinion of the two chief justices, Sir Christopher Wray and Sir Edmond Anderson, upon this controversy between that university and Mr. Ravolin, as he is therein call'd, for the nomination of vintners, and setting the price of wine there; which opinion is as follows—

"First, touching the nomination of vintners there, we think it appertaineth to the university, by usage and charters from her majesty, confirmed by parliament:

"and that Mr. Ravolin can nominate none there. For the price; it seemeth they may set prices, so as it be according to the statute, and not otherwise. And if the vintners set at higher prices, they are to be punished by law. Which penalty Mr. Ravolin may dispense withal; and yet cannot sue for the penalty by his patent against the statute laws: for therein all liberties to the university is excepted." After this, we hear no more of the dispute. See the said lord Burghley's letter, and opinion of the judges, in Mr. John Streyfe's annals of the church, tom. 3. 1728. fol. 343.

very fair road, under a brave mountain; which, for the splendid appearance it made, the cliffs thereof being as orient as gold, they named Mount Ralegh,<sup>a</sup> in honour of their proprietor; and soon after fell into the very passage they sought, since, well known by the name of Davis's Streights. The farther search whereof, through the same patronage and support, captain Davis made in two voyages more, the two following years, and in a manner compleated the said discovery.<sup>b</sup>

voyage to Virginia.

BUT about two months before Davis begun his said first voyage for this discovery, Ralegh sent out his own fleet for Virginia, which consisted of seven sail, whereof some were his own ships, and they departed from Plymouth on the 9th of April, the year above specified. He deputed his gallant relation Sir Richard Grenville general of the expedition, and Mr. Ralph Lane, who was afterwards knighted, to be governor of the colony, which they now transported. There went besides, Mr. Thomas Candish, John Arundel, Raymond, Stucley, Bremige, Vincent, Mr. John Clark, and several others, whereof some were captains, and others assistants for council and direction in the voyage. So they shaped their course to the Canary islands, from thence to Dominica, and to the island of St. John de Puerto Rico, where they were sadly stung with the Musketoos, and near which they took two Spanish frigats; one whereof was freighted with a rich cargo, and divers Spaniards of distinction, who afterwards were ransom'd for good round sums of money. Then they made away to Hispaniola, soon after which the general, and some of his company, were near being cast away in catching of Seals. From thence they sail'd to Florida,<sup>c</sup> and on the 26th of June anchor'd at Wocoken, whence they sent word of their arrival to king Wingina at Roanoak. They carried the Indians with them from England; and Manteo, on the 6th of July, led Mr. Arundel to the main continent, where they found some of their men, who had been conducted thither twenty days before, by captain Raymond. On the eleventh following, the general, accompanied by Arundel, Stucley, Lane, Candish, Hariot, Amadas, Clark, and others, passed over the water to the main land, and victuall'd their ships; in which voyage they first discover'd the towns of Pomeioc, Aquasgococ, and Secotan; also the great lake Paquipe, and many other places; then return'd to their fleet. They afterwards re-visited those parts, and were kindly entertained by the savages. Coming at last to anchor at Hatorask; prince Grangino, or Granganimeo, before mention'd, came attended by Manteo to visit them on board the admiral, which was named the Tyger. The particulars which passed between them about the settlement are not mention'd in the short journal of this voyage; but we may conclude it was agreed on to their mutual satisfaction; since one hundred and seven men, whose names are printed at the end of the said journal, under the government of Mr. Lane, were left for a year in the country, without disturbance, to begin the plantation. On the 25th of August the general weighed anchor, and set sail for England: about six days after he took a Spanish ship of three hundred ton, richly laden; and on the 18th of October arrived with the prize at Plymouth, where he was courteously receiv'd by his worshipful friend.<sup>d</sup>

OF this prize, we have some further account, if it is to be credited; for it comes from a man, who, in the latter end of Sir Walter Ralegh's life, met with countenance to prove his greatest enemy; but after his death, found himself necessitated to publish all the arguments he could devise, to justify his perfidy towards him, and assuage the reproach of mankind. This author, one of king James's knights, was the son, it seems, of that Stucley<sup>e</sup> mention'd in the foregoing voyage; who is no where call'd a captain, nor seems to have had command in any of the ships; but to have been a private gentleman, who went over as an assistant for council,

<sup>b</sup> These two voyages follow the first in the same volume. Joannes Baptista Ramusius, in the preface to his third volume of Navigations, writes with respect to this discovery of the north-west passage to the East-Indies, and the attempt first made by Sebastian Cabota, pilot-major of England, as follows: "It seems, that God does still reserve this great enterprize, for some great prince, to discover this voyage to Cathay by this way; which, for the bringing of the spiceries from India into Europe, were the most easy and shortest of all others; to make his name great, and fame immortal to all ages to come; far more than can be done by any of all those great troubles and wars which daily are used in Europe among the miserable Christian people."

"to sail from England to the coast of Virginia, than to go first to the Canaries, from thence to Hispaniola, and into the Gulph of Mexico; then out by Cuba and the Gulph of Babama; and so coast along the shore from Florida to Virginia, from the latitude of 30 minutes to 42; which is in short (says he) like going from London by Portsmouth, and from thence to Exeter, away to Bristol, and so up by the banks of the Severn to come at West-Chester." or some directions relating to the plantation. But his said son, after Raleigh's death, hence takes occasion to tell us, that one day himself upbraiding Raleigh with the injury he had done his father, in deceiving him of a great adventure, “ which my said father (says he) had in the Tyger, “ when he went to the West-Indies with my uncle Sir Richard Grenvill; which was, by his “ (Raleigh's) own confession, worth fifty thousand pounds, and came all to his hands, my father's “ portion being at least ten thousand pounds, which he might lawfully claim: he answer'd; “ that the queen, however she seem'd a great and good mistress to him in the eyes of the “ world, yet was so unjust and tyrannous to him, that she laid the envy as well of this, as of “ many other her oppressions, upon him: and that she took all the pearl in a cabinet unto “ her self, without so much as ever giving him one pearl.”<sup>a</sup> This is publish'd visibly to reflect injustice upon Raleigh towards that author's father, and ingratitude towards the queen: but how probable it will seem (had it proceeded even from an indifferent hand) that so great a share in this prize should be due to his father, and no dissatisfaction appear in his uncle; he who got it all, to be allowed also no share; or that his father should never claim so great a sum by law, which, as the son says, he might lawfully claim; and lastly, how so great a profit to Raleigh will correspond with some subsequent observations on the royal assistance he soon needed; through the slender returns these Virginian voyages made for all the charge and care he bestow'd upon them, must be submitted to the reader's judgment, when he shall arrive at those passages; and more especially at the tragical catastrophe of the whole story.

If so much good fortune did now befall Raleigh, a pretty enlargement was soon after made to it by the queen her self; somewhat unusual with the leisurely course of her bounty: but that it was a favour in conjunction, or of a comprehensive nature; from a principal share whereof, he, neither for his former eminent services, could be justly excluded; nor for the support of that chargeable discovery, by which he had so newly deserved. For an end having been put to the Munster rebellion by force of arms, and the country further laid desolate by a raging famine, which devour'd what the sword had left, except a few who remain'd in cities, fled to England, or could feed upon weeds and carrion, so as even to rob the graves and the gibbets of their dead, to keep the dying alive;<sup>b</sup> the queen soon became desirous of re-peopling the country, and to have ways consider'd on, how the late earl of Desmond's large territories in Ireland might be dispos'd of to the advantage of her and her subjects. After commissioners were sent over for this purpose, and proper methods taken to prevent fraudulent conveyances by the rebels, there was now at last a scheme resolv'd on for the plantation of Munster; and secretary Fenton carried over the instructions towards the latter end of this year.<sup>c</sup> The whole forfeiture was above five hundred seventy-four thousand acres of land;<sup>d</sup> and after some restitutions had been made, the remainder was divided into Seigniories among certain gentlemen-undertakers, as they were call'd;<sup>e</sup> but chiefly such as had been instrumental in appeasing the Irish rebellion. One of the largest divisions, which was twelve thousand acres, situate in the counties of Cork and Waterford, was given by her majesty to Sir Walter Raleigh and his heirs, with certain privileges and immunities, upon those conditions of planting and improving the same, to which the rest were also oblig'd.<sup>f</sup> And tho' many of the undertakers did not people their Seigniories with well-affected English, but sold them to English papists, or otherwise to their profit; nor fortified according to their covenants; nor forbore encroaching upon the lands of the loyal and protected Irish (as the crown on the other side fail'd of maintaining certain forces promis'd for their security from fresh invasions;) yet I meet with none of those irregularities objected to Raleigh: on the contrary, that he peopled his plantation unexceptionably; that he kept the said estate to the latter end of the queen's reign, and then sold it to Richard Boyle, afterwards the famous earl of Cork, as, in a memorial of his own life, the said

Ormond, Sir Christopher Hatton, Sir Edward Fitton, and Sir Walter Raleigh, 22910 acres. But their four shares joined, out of Cox, amount to 37425 acres. Yet in Cox this greater tract yields but 242 l. 13 s. 7 d. yearly rents; and that smaller tract in Moryson, 303 l. 3 d. So that Moryson's account falls short of the other in 14515 acres of land; And Cox's account falls short of his in 60 l. 6 s. 8 d. yearly rent. But as no other author I have met with expressly distinguishes Sir Walter Raleigh's share to have been 12000 acres, with rents 66 l. 13 s. 4 d. besides Cox; and he seems to have had good authority for that distinction; I find my self oblig'd, not only by necessity, but reason, to accept of his account. earl has related.<sup>a</sup> But as capacious as this benefit seemed, it was rather expensive perhaps at first, than profitable to him.

FOR Sir Richard Grenvill, who, at his departure from Virginia, had promis'd the colony he left behind to return punctually with supplies by the following Easter at furthest, was not altogether so expeditious as they expected; probably through some difficulties attending the charge thereof, which Raleigh's new undertaking of planting also that Seigniorie might probably render more burdenson. Grenvill brought over letters from governor Lane to a very worthy encourager of all naval adventures;<sup>b</sup> describing the commodities and fertility of the country they were about to cultivate and civilize: the said governor also drew up notes while he was there, which he afterwards methodiz'd into a Discourse of two parts, displaying the particularities of the country of Virginia, and the reasons which moved their departure from thence into England.<sup>c</sup> In this discourse we learn, that their discovery for Sir Walter Raleigh had extended from Roanoak southward, as far as Secotan, about eighty miles; northward as far as the Chesepians, being a hundred and thirty miles more; and to the north-west, as far as Chawanook, a hundred and thirty miles: and further mentions many towns about the water-side, discovered by the way. It also informs us of his enquiries after a fishery and traffick for pearl in those parts; besides a mine of strange metal like copper, but paler and softer: moreover, of the taking prince Skyco prisoner; and after the death of Granganimeo aforesaid, how his brother king Wingina changed his name, and plotted an insurrection against the English; for which he lost his life: while another king called Okisco, sent to pay homage and acknowledge subjection to the grand Weroanza, or queen of England; and after her, to Sir Walter Raleigh. Lastly, the arrival of Sir Francis Drake about the 10th of June 1586; who, returning from his prosperous conquest of St. Domingo, Cartagena, and St. Augustine, determin'd, in his way homeward, to visit his friend's colony in Virginia. They had despaired of Sir Richard Grenvill's promise; and the rather, because of the preparations then making for Flanders, and other parts of America. Their corn was indeed within a fortnight of inviting the sickle; but they were in need of many other provisions. Hereupon Drake readily proffer'd them all manner of supplies, by victuals, men, ammunition, and ships, to carry on and compleat their worthy undertaking. The governor desir'd only a ship, and so much provision as about August would carry him and his company to England, which Drake granted in full sufficiency; besides pinaces, boats, and two experienc'd masters or pilots, to abide with them, and apply themselves earnestly in the action. All this was perform'd in two days. On the next day, while some were writing letters into England, and others relating their adventures to each other, some at sea, some on shore, there arose a most violent tempest, which lasted three days; drove most of the fleet from their anchors away to sea, and in them the provisions and masters aforesaid, with the chief of the English colony; whom they saw no more till they met in England. Then Drake proffer'd them another ship; but the rest of the colony, who were left behind, all begg'd to go for England; to which Drake consenting, took them aboard on the 19th of June, and set sail.<sup>d</sup> Sir Walter Raleigh had in the mean time provided a ship of a hundred ton, freighted with all kind of provisions in a most plentiful manner, for the relief of this colony; but not sailing till after Easter, the said colony was newly departed before this fresh supply arriv'd at Virginia. After some time spent up the country, in seeking the colony and not finding it, they return'd with all the provision aforesaid into England.<sup>e</sup> About a fortnight after, Sir Richard Grenvill arrived at Virginia with three ships more, well stored for the same company of planters; but he, after much search, missing also of them and of the aforesaid ship, left fifteen men at Roanoak with plenty of supplies, and made for England; not without some conquests over the Spaniards at the Azores in his return.<sup>f</sup> And indeed Raleigh was also about this very time victorious at the same place: for, when he sent the aforesaid ship to relieve his colony, or soon after, he dispatched two more, named the Serpent and Mary-Spark, both of them his own, to the Azores against the Spaniards, under the conduct of captain Jacob Whiddon, John Evesham, and others. They departed from Plymouth on the 10th of June aforesaid, and took more Spanish prizes than they could bring home. In one of them was the governor of St. Michael's island; in another, which they took near the isle of Graciosa, was the famous Pedro de Sarmiento, governor of the streights of Magellan; who was the furthest and most experienced navigator in all Spain.<sup>a</sup> They took also three other vessels, but turned two adrift, after having taken out of them what they wanted, because they could not spare hands to man them; and after a fight for thirty-two hours with two great carracks, and the other guard-ships of twenty sail more, richly laden, they gave over for want of powder, and returned safe to Plymouth, where they were received with triumphant joy; then proceeding to Southampton, they were met by their owner Sir Walter Raleigh; rewarded them with their shares, out of the merchandize, and other commodities of value, which in those three prizes were thus taken from the enemy.<sup>b</sup> Not long after this, there was another voyage set out, the same year, by the earl of Cumberland to the South-Sea, but performed no further than the latitude of forty-four degrees to the south of the equinoctial, in which as Sir Walter Raleigh was also an adventurer, his fine pinnace, named Dorothy, being engaged therein, and some small prizes also being taken, he had, no doubt, his proportion in the profits that arose from them.<sup>c</sup>

BUT to return to the Virginian colony: it arrived at Plymouth on the 27th of July following. Camden has remember'd, that by this colony of Raleigh's, and in those ships of Drake's, the famous American plant called TOBACCO was first brought into England, by or under governor Lane,<sup>d</sup> doubtless according to the instructions they had received of their proprietor; for the introduction among us of that commodity, is generally ascrib'd to Raleigh himself. There are some pleasant stories of this plant, with relation to him, which have been as carefully preserved as the box he kept it in.<sup>e</sup> But the tradition of "Raleigh's smoking tobacco at first privately in his study, and of the servant, who used to wait on him there, surprizing him one time with his tankard of ale and nutmeg as he was intent upon his book, before he had done his pipe; and seeing the smoke reeking out of his mouth, threw all the ale in his face, then running down stairs alarm'd the family with repeated exclamations, that his master was on fire, and before they could get up would be burnt to ashes:"<sup>f</sup> This I say, if true, has nothing in it of more surprizing or unparallel'd simplicity, than there was in that poor Norwegian, who upon the first sight of Roses could not be induced to touch, tho' he saw them grow, being so amazed to behold trees budding with fire:<sup>g</sup> or, to come closer by way of retaliation, than there was in those Virginians themselves, who, the first time they seized upon a quantity of Gun-powder which belong'd to the English colony, sow'd it for grain, or the seed of some strange vegetable in the earth, with full expectation of reaping a plentiful crop of combustion by the next harvest to scatter their enemies.<sup>h</sup> But passing over these tales; as Raleigh was the first, who brought this herb in request among us, and laid the foundation for that great traffick therewith, which has been of such considerable benefit to his country; there is no less honour due to him than has been conferr'd on that ambassador, who had before brought it out of Portugal into France; where, in mentioning the herb, they pay grateful acknowledgments to the importer, by calling it Nicotiana after his own name: nay, his polittick soveraign Catherine de Medicis, did so zealously encourage the use of it, that it was also afterwards in honour of her called the Queen's Herb.<sup>i</sup> Nor was the queen of England back-outward appearance to nothing more nearly than one of our modern Muff-cases; about the same height and width, cover'd with red leather, and open'd at top (but with a hinge, I think) like one of those. In the inside, there was a cavity for a receiver of glass or metal, which might hold half a pound or a pound of tobacco; and from the edge of the receiver at top, to the edge of the box, a circular flay or collar, with holes in it, to plant the tobacco about, with six or eight pipes to smoke it in. This travelling box, with the MSS. Medals and other rarities in its company, descending to a young clergyman, the son of the deceased, was soon after reported to have been translated to London.

ward in listening to, and promoting the advantages it was promis'd to produce. We may gather from some authors, that she was very curious to know its virtues and properties; and that once conversing with Raleigh upon this subject, "he assured her majesty he had so well experienced the nature of it, that he could tell her of what weight even the smoke would be in any quantity propos'd to be consum'd. Her majesty fixing her thoughts upon the most impracticable part of the experiment, that of bounding the smoke in a ballance, suspected that he put the traveller upon her; and would needs lay him a wager he could not solve the doubt: so he procured a quantity agreed upon to be thoroughly smok'd; then went to weighing; but it was of the ashes; and in the conclusion, what was wanting in the prime weight of the tobacco, her majesty did not deny to have been evaporated in smoke; and further said, that many labourers in the fire she had heard of who turned their gold into smoke, but Raleigh was the first who had turned smoke into gold." <sup>a</sup> Whether those two queens did ever recommend the use of this herb by their own example, we are not certain; but it is evident, it soon became of such vogue in queen Elizabeth's court, that some of the great ladies, as well as noblemen therein, would not scruple to take a pipe sometimes very sociably; however, it was such an abomination to the refined palate of her Scotch successor, that he not only refused the use of it himself, but endeavoured to rob his crown of what has since proved one of its greatest revenues, <sup>b</sup> by restraining his subjects also from it. Indeed it is not to be wonder'd that such a philosopher, as could magnify the power of witches, after the manner he has done in one of his learned pamphlets, <sup>c</sup> should be such a politician as to discourage the taking of tobacco in another. <sup>d</sup> But those who have not admir'd at his prejudice in this attempt to dispel the fumes of that herb with greater of his own, if I may allude to the witty title of his performance without imputation of irreverence to his memory, may yet applaud his policy, in so far conducing to its suppression, as to exclude it from the body of his works, when this Royal Pamphleteer resolved to become an author in folio. As for the uses and virtues of this plant; since so many learned writers have given us whole books upon them, I shall only

<sup>b</sup> An author of experience has lately informed us; "That the benefit of this vegetable to Great Britain is prodigious, if we consider the short time since it was first introduced into England by Sir Walter Raleigh. 'Tis now become, says he, the staple of two of his majesty's colonies, inhabited by half a million of people; many of whom could hardly support themselves at home; yet there they live in great splendor and ease; having sumptuous buildings, rich equipages, slaves and other attendance. According to the exactest computation that has been made on this branch of our trade, about 430 sail of ships, with above 5000 seamen, have been employ'd in one year to bring over about 75,000 hogheads of tobacco from Virginia and Maryland; the freight of which, at 8 l. per ton (a medium in times of peace) amounts to 150,000 l. sterling; most of which sum centers among our selves, in the payment of sailors and tradesmen, who live by shipping; besides about 15 s. per hoghead custom-house fees, cooperage, lighterage, wharfage, portage, cartage, ware-house rent, brokerage, and other incident charges. 'Tis further calculated, that out of the said 75,000 hogheads imported, there are exported 46,000 hogheads, containing 720 lb. per hoghead, at four pence per pound on board; which amounts to 552,000 l. towards supporting the ballance of trade with foreign nations." The same author a little further observes, "as another great benefit arising from this vegetable, that the produce is laid out in our British manufactures, and exported to the British colonies; which in one year has amounted to 500,000 l. (and would be much more, if proper encouragement were given to manufacture it before exportation) therefore it may be justly said, that tobacco is become in few years one of the most valuable branches of trade belonging to Great Britain." Thus far Mr. John Lacy, tobacco-merchant, in his observations on the nature, use and trade of tobacco. Folio, one sheet, printed Mar. 1. 1733. Besides the advantage this vegetable is of to trade, a large revenue arises to the crown by custom-duties on tobacco. — I have seen several estimates of its gross and net produce, and also several estimates of what it might further produce, if put under a new regulation; but there being so much difference in the several calculations, that no certain judgment can, without much scrutiny and distinction, be formed from them; it may be thought sufficient here to observe, that I have seen an account, upon the veracity whereof I can depend, by which it appears, the money paid on this article of tobacco into his majesty's exchequer in the year 1731, was 175,277 l. 8 s. 10 d. and that a medium for seven years past to that time was 169,079 l. 0 s. 10 d.

<sup>c</sup> Dæmonologie: a discourse in three books, Edinb. cum privil. Reg. 4to. 1597. In the preface whereof, king James protests he did not publish this pamphlet for a shew of his learning and ingine, but to preassure thereby, as far as he can, to resolve the doubting hearts of many, both that such assaults of Sathan are most certainly practis'd, and that the instrumentes thereof merits most severely to be punished; against the damnable opinions of two principally in our age; whereof the one, called Scot an Englishman, is not ashamed in publick print to deny, that there can be such a thing as witchcraft; so mainteines the old error of the Sadducees, in denying of spirits: the other call'd Wierus a German physician, sets out a publick apology for all these Craftes-folkes; whereby procuring for their impunity, he plainly bewrayes himself to have been one of that profession." Then his majesty lays down the method he intends to follow, in speaking first, of magic and negromancy; secondly, of sorcery and witchcraft; lastly, of all kinds of spirits and spectres, that appears and troubles persons. His further affirmation of magicians raising suddenly all dainty dishes; bringing wine out of a wall; and making men unable for women; contains not yet the most remarkable passages in this crowned author; for if you would have a masterpiece of his royal scholarship in the mysteries of nature, turn to his chapter of the Incubi and Succubi; there you have Rex Platonius in perfection. But as many old womens notions as there are in this tract, Sir Walter Raleigh was at the pains of finding something he could approve in it, and generously honours its author before all others for the same, as may be seen by the very first quotation he makes, in the introduction to his History of the World.

<sup>d</sup> Entitled the Counterblast to Tobacco, 4to. without date. There is also extant K. James's warrant to the lord-treasurer Dorset, Anno 1604, for laying a good heavy imposition upon tobacco, that less quantity may be brought into the realm, and only sufficient for the better sort, who will use it with moderation for their health; wherefore he authorises the said treasurer to order, that from the 26th of Octob. ensuing, the proper officers should take, of all who import tobacco, the sum of six shillings and eight pence upon every pound weight, over and above the custom of two pence per pound, usually paid heretofore. Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. here observe from the first author among us, who wrote thereof out of his own experience; immediately upon his return with the colony aforesaid from Virginia, where he had been employ'd by Raleigh to survey the country and describe its products; that the savages distinguished it by sowing it apart from all other vegetables, and held it of highest estimation in all their sacrifices by fire, water and air, either for thanksgiving to, or pacification of their gods. And as by sucking it through pipes of clay, they purged all gross humours from the head and stomach; opened all the pores and passages of the body; preserving it from obstructions, or breaking them, whereby they notably preserved health and knew not many grievous diseases where-with we in England are often afflicted: So “we ourselves, says he, during the time we were “there, used to suck it after their manner, as also since our return, and have found many “rare and wonderful experiments of its virtues, whereof the relation would require a volume “by it self, the use of which by so many men and women of great calling, as well as others,
“and some learned physicians also, is sufficient witness.”<sup>a</sup>

THE learned author of this account, Mr. Thomas Hariot, a famous mathematician, of whom something more will be spoken hereafter, having further in the said discourse confuted the calumnies, which had been raised of this new discover'd country, by the idle, ignorant and avaritious part of the colony lately returned from it, and given a faithful relation of the merchantable commodities, with those fit for food or building, and an account of the natures of the people, in three parts, expresses himself towards the conclusion of the whole in this manner. “Seeing the air there is so temperate and wholesome; the soil so fertile, and yielding “such commodities, as I have before-mentioned; the voyage also to and fro sufficiently ex“perienced to be performed twice a year with ease, and at any season; and the dealings of “Sir Walter Raleigh so liberal in large giving and granting lands there, as is already known,
“with many helps and furtherances else; the least that he hath granted, having been five hun“dred acres to a man only for the adventure of his person: I hope there remains no cause “whereby the action should be disliked.”<sup>b</sup>

His encour-

THERE are many other publick testimonies in recommendation of this enterprise, especially of Raleigh's discreet orders or instructions to these first undertakers, as well as some complaints that his said directions were not always punctually followed; and I remember to have met with a scarce old tract in the Lambeth library, written by a learned and ingenious author of those times, wherein, according to his brief and volatile way, skimming over the characters of many eminent contemporaries, he mentions Sir Walter Raleigh's political government of Virginia.<sup>c</sup> But where to come at those particular laws or instructions now, I know not, tho' they seem to have been in the possession of Sir Francis Walsingham (a great encourager of these plantations.) For I find a bundle entitled, matters relating to Sir Walter Raleigh's voyages, mentioned in the inventory of that secretary's state-papers relating to the navy, about this time.<sup>d</sup> But the author, who this year dedicates his Irish history to Raleigh, has in general terms, both largely commended his proceedings in that discovery, and inform'd us of others, who have done the like. For having mentioned the ill success wherewith his first maritime adventures were attended, as a matter sufficient to have dismay'd a man of common resolution from the like attempts for the future; he adds: “Yet you, more respecting the good ends whereunto “you levelled your line for the good of your country, did not give over till you had re“covered a land, and had made a plantation of the people of your own English nation in “Virginia, the first English colony that was ever planted there; not a little to the deroga-“tion of the Spaniards glory and impeachment to their vaunts, who, because, with all cruel “immanity, they subdued a naked and yielding people, whom they sought for gain, and not “for religion or the plantation of a common-wealth, over whom, to satisfy their insatiable “covetousness, they did most cruelly tyrannize, and against the course of all human nature scorch “and roast them to death, as by their own histories doth appear. These, I say, do brag and “vaunt, that they only have drawn strange nations and unknown people to the obedience of “their kings, to the knowledge of Christianity, and to the enriching of their country; and “thereby claim the honour to themselves alone. But if these your actions were well looked “into and with due consideration, it shall be found much more honourable in sundry respects
“for the advancement of the name of God, the honour of the prince, and the benefit of the “ religion, than which cannot be a more pleasant and sweet sacrifice, and a more acceptable service before God ? And what can be more honourable to princes, than to enlarge the bounds of their kingdoms, without injury, wrong and bloodshed, and to frame them from a savage life to a civil government, neither of which the Spaniards in their conquests have performed ? And what can be more beneficial to a common-wealth, than to have a nation and a kingdom to transfer unto, the superfluous multitude of fruitless and idle people ( here, at home, daily increasing) to travel, conquer, and manure another land, which, by the due intercourses to be devised, may and will yield infinite commodities ? And how well you do deserve every way, in following so honourable a course, not we our selves only can witness, but strange nations also do honour you for the same ; as doth appear by the epistle of Bassimerus of France to the history of Florida, and by Julius Cæsar a citizen of Rome, in his epistle to his book, intitled Columbeados. ” <sup>a</sup> To this we may here add the testimony of Camden ; who, speaking of this undertaking of Virginia, at the return of the last colony sent thither by Sir W. Raleigh, says, He was a man never to be sufficiently commended for the great pains he took in discovering remote countries, and advancing the glory of the English navigation. <sup>b</sup>

learned and
men.

THAT Bassimerus, as Hooker calls him, was the learned Martine Bassaniere of Paris, as I find elsewhere, with whom Richard Hakluyt, the worthy collector of our naval adventures, being acquainted, and having procured a very valuable history in manuscript of the first discovery of Florida about twenty years before this time, by Rene Laudonniere and three other French captains, he sent it over to that Monsieur Bassaniere, who published it from the said French copy, this year <sup>c</sup> at Paris, and dedicated it as aforesaid to Sir Walter Raleigh, who, as appears above, is therein celebrated, for I have not yet seen, tho’ I have been promised, that original French edition. But it was translated into English the year following by Richard Hakluyt himself, who also dedicates it anew to the same patron : and indeed we find Raleigh from this time a very considerable patron of learned and ingenious authors, not only in history and geography, but antiquities, chymistry, poetry, and other polite branches of art and science ; some further instances whereof will occasionally arise as we proceed. And even here we may mention something of his encouragement in painting ; for admiral Coligny having sent over with the aforesaid discoverers of Florida, a very skilful artist from France, to take draughts of whatever he found observable and worthy of representation in the said country ; which he did, not only among the animal and vegetable rarities thereof, but also, it seems, from the customs of the natives and historical events among the discoverers themselves : this painter living afterwards in London, at, or before the publication of those discoveries ; was supported by Raleigh in the great expence of publishing also his draughts and descriptions. For Hakluyt, among other reasons for not particularizing the commodities of those parts ; the accidents of the Frenchmen’s government therein ; the causes of their good and bad success ; with the surprises made by their enemies, tells Raleigh he does not reckon them up again ; “ the rather, because the same, with divers other things of chiefest importance, are lively drawn in colours at your no small charges, by the skilful painter James Morgues sometime living in Black-Fryars, London, whom Monsieur Chastillon, then admiral of France, sent thither (to Florida) with Laudonniere for that purpose, which ( painter) was an eye-witness of the goodness and fertility of those regions, and hath put down in writing many singularities, which are not mentioned in this treatise ; and which he hath since published together with the portraitures. ” <sup>d</sup> Hereunto we may further add, that there was about this time also another book dedicated to Raleigh, in praise of musick, wherein, besides the antiquity and dignity thereof, is declared the sober and lawful use of the same in the congregation and church of God. <sup>e</sup> It was written by an Oxonian then lately deceased, who is not named, and published by the university printer, who subscribing his own name Joseph Barnes to the said dedication, has made it pass among our auctioneers, and other superficial inspectors, for a treatise of the said printer’s writing. I apprehend, there was a greater propriety in the publisher’s choice of this patron to that work, than is now commonly known ; for I have somewhere met with hints, that Sir Walter Raleigh was a great proficient in musick, either vocal, instrumental, or both ; whence we might be <sup>c</sup> So Hakluyt himself in the first edition of his voyages, 1589. fol. 543. Yet in the preface to his second volume printed fol. 1599, he says ‘twas in the year 1587, that he caused that history of Florida to be published in France ;

which must be a mistake, because Hooker mentions its being published in his dedication dated the year before.

somewhat induted to construe some lines of Spenser's concerning him, hereafter quoted, in the literal sense.

NOR among learned and ingenious men only was Raleigh now in great esteem; but he flourished at this time also highly in the queen's favour, as Camden, where he speaks of the foregoing colony, has informed us. And about this time it was, her majesty conferred upon him some preferments; but of honour more than profit perhaps to him: for Hooker in the dedication aforesaid of his Irish history, dated the 12th of October this year, supercribes it to the right worthy and honourable gentleman, Sir Walter Raleigh, Knt. Seneschal<sup>a</sup> of the dutchies of Cornwall and Exeter, and lord-warden of the stannaries<sup>b</sup> in Devon and Cornwall. To these dignities I presume he was then but newly advanced, because the said historian in the body of the dedication begs leave to remember "how it hath pleased God to bring you, says he, into "the favour of your prince and sovereign; who, besides her great favour towards you many "ways, hath also laid upon you the charge of a government in your own country; where "you are to command many people by your honourable office of the stannary, and where "you are both a judge and a chancellor to rule in justice and to judge in equity. — Be "therefore careful to be reported well of for your upright dealings both herein and in all your "other actions. Be a patron of virtue and an example of true nobility, which hath her "foundation upon virtue; for, as the poet saith, Ex virtute nobilitas nascitur, non ex nobilitate "virtus: virtus sola nobilitat, non caro nec sanguis. — Your ancestors were men of great no- "bility; beneficial to their princes and country many ways: and, as in nature you are def- "cended from them; so it hath pleased God to bless you with knowledge in learning, with "skill of warlike service, and experience in maritimal causes; and besides hath placed you "among the nobles, and in the good grace and favour of your prince."

Made Seneschal of Cornwall and Exeter, and Lord-warden of the stannaries.

How Raleigh used this favour, and what usage it also procured him, the same dedication does somewhat further reveal in these words. "It is well known, that it had been no less "easy for you, than for such as have been advanced by kings, to have builded great houses, "purchased large circuits, and to have used the fruits of princes favours, as most men in all "former and present ages have done; had you not preferred the general honour and com- "modity of your prince and country before all that is private: whereby you have been rather "a servant than a commander to your own fortune. And no doubt, the cause being so good, "and the attempt so honourable, but that God will increase your talent and bless your do- "ings, and every good man will commend and further the same. And albeit the more no- "ble enterprises a man shall take in hand, the more adversaries he shall have to deprave and "hinder the same; yet I am persuaded, as no good man shall have just cause, so there is none "so much carried with a corrupt mind, nor so envious of his country's honour, nor so bent "against you, that he will derogate the praise and honour due to so worthy an enterprise. "And that so much the sooner, because you have endured so many crosses, and have, through "so many envyings and misfortunes, persevered in your attempts; which no doubt shall, at "last, by you be performed, when it shall please him, who hath made you an instrument of "so worthy a work."

Envy'd.

Thus Hooker hints at the cause of these envyings; but from whom they should proceed it does not manifestly appear. The earl of Essex had now been near a twelve-month abroad, under his father-in-law, Leicester, governor of the Netherlands; was but nineteen years of age when he went over, being his first engagement in any publick action, yet no less than a general of the horse; and before that, as himself says, "he had small grace, and few friends "at court." <sup>d</sup> So that it must be now after their return, <sup>e</sup> that Leicester set him up a competitor

petitor against Raleigh, as we are before informed out of Sir Henry Wotton. But Leicester, as great as his power was, could no more bridle the licentious reflections of the populace than Raleigh; an instance whereof we have from some antient authority it seems, tho' in a modern author, who speaking of "Tarleton, the best comedian of these times in England, tells us, "that when a pleasant play he had made was acting before her majesty, he pointed at Sir Walter Raleigh, and said, See the knave commands the queen; for which she corrected him "with a frown: yet he had the confidence to add, that he was of too much and too intolerable "a power; and going on with the same liberty, he reflected on the over-great power and "riches of the earl of Leicester; which was so universally applauded by all who were present, that she thought fit at that time to bear these reflections with a seeming unconcernedness; but yet was so offended, that she forbade Tarleton and all her jesters from coming "near her table, being inwardly displeased with this impudent and unreasonable liberty." " Raleigh seems to have little regarded these aspersions, but constantly attended his publick charge and employments, whether in town or country as occasion called him. Accordingly we find him the latter end of this year in parliament, where, among other weighty concerns, the fate of Mary queen of Scots was determined. There is nothing particular upon record in the journals of the house of commons of Raleigh's opinion in this matter, nor indeed any debates upon the sentence that had been pronounced against that queen. For on the 12th of November, a petition agreed upon in both houses was presented to queen Elizabeth, by the speaker Puckering, the privy-council, and a body of the commons, joyned with the lord-chancellor Bromley and twenty other temporal lords, for the speedy execution of the said queen of Scots, in consideration of the treasonable and rebellious practices wherewith she had been proved to endanger this realm and its ruler. The said petition was immediately printed, <sup>b</sup> and that queen in less than three months after executed. <sup>c</sup> The clerk of the parliament's place being supplied at this time by a kinsman, inexpert in the rules and methods of the house; we find nothing more recorded of Raleigh this session, which was dissolved on the 23d of March, than that he was appointed one of the committee to confer upon the amendment of some things, whereunto the clergy were required to be sworn, and that some good course might be taken to have a learned ministry; for the queen had in her speech at the close of the last session told the bishops of some faults and negligences, "which if you, my lords of the clergy, said she, do not amend, I mean to depose you." <sup>d</sup>

Now Raleigh, resolving to persevere in planting his country of Virginia, prepared a new colony of one hundred and fifty men to be sent thither, under the charge of Mr. John White, whom he appointed governor, and with him twelve assistants, to whom he gave a charter, and incorporated them by the name of the governor and assistants of the city of Raleigh in Virginia. Their fleet, consisting of three sail, departed from Portsmouth on the 26th of April, 1587, and in less than three months following arrived safe at Hatorask, from whence they went to the isle of Roanoke to look for the fifteen men left there by Sir Richard Grenvill the year before, meaning from thence to pass to the bay of Chesepiock, where they intended to make their seat and fort, according to the charge given them, among other directions, under the hand of Sir Walter Raleigh. But they sought their companions in vain, and when they came to the north-part of the island where governor Lane had built his fort, they found it razed, and the ground-rooms of the dwelling-houses, which had been also erected about it, inhabited by deer, and over-grown with melons, or such like sort of fruit, which those animals brooz'd upon. At Croatoan they were very well received and entertained by the natives, thro' the means of Manteo their country-man. Of these they learnt, that the Englishmen they were seeking, had been treacherously set upon by a party of the savages, who wounded some of ing a medal, representing his own head on one side, and seven unguarded straggling sheep on the other. The author of a brief discourse of Dr. Allen's seditious drifts, &c. 4to. 1588. p. 46. endeavours to clear the earl's conduct in that government against the said doctor; as E. Cliffe, in his breviare of Holland's deliverance and ingratitude to the crown of England and the house of Nassau, 4to. 1665. p. 55. does against Vander Sande and Hugo Grotius; especially the latter, who insinuates, as if the earl, who died within two years following, was poisoned by his wife, because she soon after married again. I have read, this earl's effects were then seized upon by the crown for debt, and heard that an inventory of them is in the possession of Sir John Evelyn, Bart.

<sup>c</sup> The imperfections wherewith Camden was obliged in king James's reign to publish that part of queen Elizabeth's annals, relating to the queen of Scots, have occasioned some voluminous publications of the memorials to be found on both sides of her character; on one side, about sixteen tracts in Latin, French, &c. chiefly by Roman catholicks, were collected by a late bookseller, and published by Dr. Samuel Jebb, 2 vols. folio, 1725. them, and drove the rest to some remote and obscure parts of the country. On the thirteenth of August, their friend Manteo was, according to the commands they had received of Sir Walter Raleigh, christened in Roanoke, and called lord thereof, and of Dasamonguepeuk, in reward of his faithful services. Three days after, the governor's daughter Eleanor, wife of Ananias Dare, one of the assistants, was delivered of a daughter in Roanoke, and the infant was christened there the Sunday following, who, because she was the first Creolian or Christian born in that country, was baptized by the name of Virginia. Now having re-established their interest and alliance with the natives, as far as this short interview would permit, and delivered their ships of the provisions for the colony, the planters began to consider, they should be in want of fresh supplies; therefore upon some difference about choosing a factor to return for that purpose into England, they unanimously petitioned the governor to return himself, to which he at last consented, and the ships with some few of the company arrived in England, not without storms, sickness, and the death of several of them by other like casualties, about the latter end of the same year. <sup>a</sup>

It was but five days after the going forth of this second colony, that Mr. Richard Hakluyt dedicated his translation of the voyages to Florida, before-mentioned, to the right honourable Sir Walter Raleigh, as he styles him, captain of her majesty's guard, lord-warden of the stannaries, and her highness's lieutenant-general of the county of Cornwall. In this dedication it will somewhat appear, that neither the returns, which might have been made by any merchantable products in Virginia, nor the profits arising to him from any Spanish prizes, which had been taken at sea, were equivalent to the great expences he had been at, in settling this plantation; and further, that he had received no particular or private assistance in this enterprise from the queen, because his hopes therein, and her majesty's regard thereof, are so handsomely excited by the said author: but take his own words. "These four voyages
 " (says he) I knew not to whom I might better offer than to your self, for divers just considerations: first, for that they were dedicated to you in French: secondly, because now
 " four times also you have attempted the like upon the self-same coast near adjoining:
 " thirdly, in that you have pierced as far up into the main, and discovered no less secrets
 " in the parts of your abode, than the French did in the places of their inhabiting: lastly,
 " considering you are now also ready (upon the late return of captain Stafford, and good " news which he brought you of the safe arrival of your last colony in their wished haven)
 " to prosecute this action more thoroughly than ever. And here to speak somewhat of this " your enterprize, I affirm, that if the same may speedily and effectually be pursued, it will " prove far more beneficial in divers respects to this our realm, than the world, yea many " of the wiser sort have, hitherto imagined. The particular commodities thereof are well " known to your self and some few others, and are faithfully and with great judgment committed to writing, as you are not ignorant, by one of your followers, who remained there
 " about a twelve-month with your worshipful lieutenant Mr. Ralph Lane, in the diligent " search of the secrets of those countries. Touching the speedy and effectual pursuing of " your action, tho' I wote well it would demand a prince's purse to have it thoroughly followed without lingering: yet I am of opinion, that you shall draw the same, before it be " long, to be profitable and gainful, as well to those of our nation there remaining, as to the " merchants of England, that shall trade hereafter thither; partly by certain secret commodities already discovered by your servants, and partly by breeding of divers sorts of beasts in " those large and ample regions, and planting such things in that warm climate as will best
 " prosper there, and our realm standeth most in need of: and this I find to have been the " course which both the Spaniards and Portugals took, in the beginnings of their discoveries
 " and conquests. <sup>b</sup> And, if our men will follow their steps by your wise directions, I doubt " not, but in due time they shall reap no less benefit. Moreover, there is no other likeli-

Among whom governor White, and the pilot Simon Ferdinando are mentioned, but erroneously; for it appears in the narrative of that voyage, they both returned.

<sup>b</sup> Here this author illustrates his address by these examples; "The Spaniards at their first entrance (says he) into Hispaniola, found neither sugar-canes nor ginger growing there, nor any kind of our cattle; but finding the place fit for pasture, they sent kine and bulls, and sundry other profitable beasts thither, and transported

" the plants of sugar-canes, and set the roots of ginger;
 " the hides of which oxen, with the sugar and ginger,
 " are now the chief merchandize of that island. 'The " Portugals also at their first footing in Madera, as *John
 " Barros* writes in his first Decade, found nothing there
 " but mighty woods for timber, whereupon they called
 " the island by that name: howbeit, the climate being favourable, they enriched it by their own industry, with " the best wines and sugars in the world. 'The like " manner of proceeding they used in the isles of the " Azores, by sowing therein great quantity of wood.
 " So they dealt in St. Thomas under the Equinoctial; and " in Brazil, and in sundry other places.

“ hood, but that her majesty, who hath christned and given the name to your Virginia, if “ need require, will deal after the manner of honourable god-mothers, which seeing their “ gossip not fully able to bring up their children themselves, are wont to contribute to their “ honest education, the rather if they find any towardliness or reasonable hopes of goodness in “ them.

“ AND if Elizabeth, queen of Castile and Aragon, after her husband Ferdinando and “ she had emptied their coffers in subduing the kingdom of Granada, was nevertheless so “ zealous of God’s honour, that she laid part of her own jewels, which she had in great ac“ count, to gage, to furnish Columbus forth upon his first voyage, before a foot of land in all
 “ the West-Indies was discovered; what may we expect of our most magnificent and gra“ cious prince Elizabeth of England, into whose lap the Lord has so plentifully thrown his “ treasures? What may we, I say, hope of her forwardness and bounty, in advancing this “ your most honourable enterprise, being far more certain than that of Columbus, at that time “ especially, and tending no less to the glory of God than that of the Spaniards? ”
 Then a little further: “ Sundry men entering into these discoveries, propose unto themselves “ several ends; some seek authority and places of command; others experience by seeing of “ the world; the most part, worldly and transitory gain, and that oftentimes by dishonest “ and unlawful means; the fewest number, the glory of God, and the saving of the souls of “ the poor and blinded infidels: yet because divers honest and well-disposed persons are en“ tered already into this your business, and that I know you mean hereafter to send some “ such good church-men thither, as may truly say, with the apostle, to the savages, we seek “ not yours, but you, I conceive great comfort of the success of this your action; hoping,
 “ that the Lord, whose power is wont to be perfected in weakness, will bless the feeble foun“ dations of your building: only be you of a valiant courage, and faint not, as the Lord “ said to Joshua, exhorting him to proceed in the conquest of the land of promise; and re“ member, that private men have happily weilded and waded through as great enterprises as “ this, with lesser means than those, which God in his mercy hath bountifully bestowed up“ on you, to the singular good, as I assure my self, of this our common-wealth, wherein “ you live: hereof there are examples domestical and foreign.<sup>a</sup> — But if the greatness of “ the main of Virginia, especially to the west, should make you think the subduing of it a “ matter of more difficulty than the conquest of Ireland (by Strongbow;) first, I answer, that “ as the late experience of that skilful pilot, captain John Davis, to the north-west, towards “ which his discovery your self has thrice contributed with the forwardest, hath shewed a “ great part to be main-sea, where before it was thought main-land. So for my part, I am “ fully persuaded by Ortelius his late reformation of Calvacan and the gulph of California, “ that the land on the back-part of Virginia, extends nothing so far west-ward as is put down “ in the maps of those parts. Moreover, it is not to be deny’d, that one hundred men will “ do more now among the naked and unarmed people in Virginia than one thousand were “ able then to do in Ireland, against that armed and warlike nation in those days. I say fur“ ther, that these two last years experience hath plainly shewed, that we may spare ten thou“ sand able men, without any miss. — Seeing therefore we are so far from want of people, “ that retiring daily home out of the Low-countries, they go idle up and down in swarms
 “ for lack of honest entertainments; I see no fitter place to employ some part of the better “ sort, than in the inward parts of Virginia, against such stubborn savages as shall re“ fuse obedience to her majesty. And doubtless many of our men will be glad and fain to “ accept this condition, when by reading this present treatise, they shall understand the fertili“ ty and riches of the regions confining so near upon yours, the great commodities and “ goodness whereof you have been contented to suffer to come to light. In the mean season, “ I humbly commend my self and this my translation to you; and your self, with all those “ who have undertaken this enterprise in hand, to the grace and good blessing of the Al“ mighty; which is able to build further, and finish the good work, which in these our days “ he hath begun by your most christian and charitable endeavour. ” Such were the praises of this discovery, and exhortations to proceed in it, that were publickly paid to Sir Walter Raleigh

 beth*, to support this chargeable enterprise, by example;
 so here he encourages Sir Walter Raleigh to proceed in it by the like means, in these words, “ Remember, I pray “ you, what you find in the beginning of the chronicle “ of Ireland, newly dedicated unto your self. Read “ you not, that Richard Strongbow, the decayed earl of “ Clifmore, passed over thither in the year 1171; and, “ accompanied only with certain private friends, had in “ short space such prosperous success, that he opened the “ way for king Henry II. to the speedy subjection of all “ that warlike nation to this crown of England? The “ like conquest of Brazilia, and the annexing thereof to “ the kingdom of Portugal, was first begun by mean

 “ and private men; as Don Antonio de Castillio, ambassa“ dor here for that realm, and by office, keeper of all “ the records and monuments of their discoveries, af“ firmed me in this city, Anno 1581. ” These examples, as not directly necessary to the history of my subject, are thus subjoin’d, because they illustrate the arguments of my author.

at this his setting out the fourth voyage to Virginia, by those who wish'd it might contribute no less to the improvement of his fortune, than it did to the advancement of his glory.

BUT the ships, in which this second colony was transported, had not been many days returned into England, before we find Raleigh's thoughts diverted, for a while, from planting in a foreign country, and engaged upon schemes of displanting rather those powerful enemies who were preparing to root themselves in his own. For the rumour grew stronger every day of such a mighty fleet threatening us, as if all Spain and Rome were to land upon our little island, and over-run the whole kingdom. The queen and her privy-council therefore no longer delay'd all proper means for the defence of the realm; but out of all her commanders by land and sea appointed those of most approved abilities in naval and military affairs, as well as of the greatest authority in their respective counties, to hold consultations for the security of her person, her people, and their possessions. And as there were such consultations distinctly held by the most ancient and experienc'd commanders at sea; so we find by the like appointment a council of war also held on the 27th of November this year by others of highest repute for their knowledge how to put the forces of the realm in the best order, to withstand any invasion by land. For this purpose were chosen the lord Grey<sup>a</sup>, Sir Francis Knolles<sup>b</sup>, Sir Thomas Leighton<sup>c</sup>, Sir Walter Raleigh<sup>d</sup>, for I recite, as I find them written, Sir John Norris<sup>e</sup>, Sir Richard Grenvill<sup>f</sup>, Sir Richard Bingham<sup>g</sup>, Sir Roger Williams<sup>h</sup>, and Ralph Lane Esq;<sup>i</sup> Of their determinations in this important council I shall here present an abstract, from a manuscript drawn up perhaps by Sir Walter Raleigh himself; the said draught being annex'd to another manuscript now before me, which was apparently of his composing.<sup>k</sup>

In the national Council of war.

THEY first number'd up the places most suspected for the army from Spain, and also those most convenient for that in Flanders, to land at: then concluded how many of those places were to be put in defence to hinder their landing. And first they took notice of Milford; which tho' they did not suspect would be preferr'd for the barrenness of the country, yet in regard to the goodness of the haven, they thought it convenient there should be a trained number of two thousand foot and five hundred horse in readiness; and that in want of horse-men, the gentlemen and their servants were to supply the deficiency. But Plymouth they thought the most likely place; because it was improbable the king of Spain would venture his fleet too far within the sleeve, before he had master'd some good harbour; of which Plymouth is nearest to Spain, soonest fortified, and most convenient to be succour'd either from Spain or France. Portland they also thought a tempting place, having a large harbour and good landing. The Isle of Wight they consider'd as a strong retreat, if won, and the country adjoining champion; where the enemy might march his whole army. And why they thought the Downs, Margate, and the Thames, fit landing-places, was in regard to the easiness of landing; and being nearest the prince of Parma, in whose forces the king of Spain reposed special trust. Then they consulted whether these places were to be strengthened by fortification, or assembly of the people, or both; and concluded, that for Plymouth, there should be both; and that the five thousand trained men in Devon and Cornwal, besides the Stannaries, were to be assembled for Plymouth, standing equal to both counties: of this number, instead of muster-days, chargeable and of little effect, two thousand should be assembled in Plymouth, under the general to be appointed over the western army, that they might know their leaders, be acquainted with watch and ward, and so instructed, that on a sudden there might be no confusion; and this to be half at the charge of her majesty, and half on the country, if the country charge surmounted not the ordinary trainings. Portland also was to be arm'd both by fortification and assembly; for the

<sup>b</sup> Knight of the garter, treasurer of the queen's household, and privy-counsellor, a prudent and learned man, trained in military affairs; and perhaps now governor of the Isle of Wight, whereof he writ a General Survey, tho' it was never printed.

<sup>c</sup> Governor of the Isle of Guernsey, well vers'd in matters of state, as well as the army; sent into France afterwards in 1591, of special trust, to advise the earl of Essex in his actions there; and author of Les Loix, coutumes, & usages de l'Isle de Guernsey, différentes du coutumier de Normandie, d'antiquité observées en ladite Isle. A fair written copy whereof, in eight sheets Folio, is in the Harleian library.

<sup>h</sup> A valiant and experienc'd commander in the French and Belgick wars, of whom further mention will be made in the course of this history.

<sup>i</sup> Late governor of Virginia, as before observ'd; afterwards knighted, and prefer'd to some considerable post in the navy or the treasury; a man able either to give counsel in warlike affairs, or put it in execution; was author, besides his discourses on Virginia, of several military memorials in letters to the lord-treasurer and others; particularly one, on the use to be made of Don Antonio against Spain; another, about encamping of soldiers, and inconvenience of quartering them in towns, &c.

two thousand seven hundred trained men in Dorsetshire and Wiltshire were to be assembled for that place; and two thousand of them to be exercised as before, in some part of Wiltshire, appointed for the Isle of Wight, to take Somersetshire in, which are two thousand foot. At Sandwich and the Downs by assembly. In Kent and Sussex, the four thousand five hundred trained men to be assembled for defence there; and two thousand of them to be exercised at Sandwich, as before. The like order to be taken for Norfolk and Suffolk. Their further meaning was, that these garrisons should remain but for twenty days, to be thoroughly train'd, and acquainted with encamping. Then every such two thousand men in garrison thus disciplin'd, should give example to a great army of raw men, so prevent confusion on a sudden. Further, that twenty captains should be appointed to every such two thousand men; which captains having each of them a hundred trained men, should receive under them when the army assembled a hundred more; so as in effect there would be four thousand men in order, and under martial discipline. Half these captains were to be chosen by the general of the army, the rest to be from the principal gentry of the country; under whom were soldiers to be appointed for their lieutenants. And the same order to be observ'd in all other places of garrison. Then they consider'd on the course to be taken for fighting the enemy, if by force he should land; and this they agreed must be left to the discretion of the general; only advised, if they could not prevent his landing and marching forward, that the country be driven, so as no victuals remain to the invaders, and that they be kept waking with perpetual alarms; but in no wise to venture battle, till divers lieutenants were assembled to make a strong army, as before specified; except upon special advantages. Further, that in those provinces where there are many lieutenants, some one to be appointed chief leader, that there be no straining of courtesy among one another, and giving thereby advantage to the enemy; but that every lieutenant's authority shall only extend to the command of his own company, as colonel of that regiment, and be commanded by the lieutenants-general: as in Devon and Cornwall, there being ten lieutenants; whereby it shall be known who shall command in either, as need shall require. Next they consider'd what proportion of men must be prepared for this end. Here supposing the enemy landed at Plymouth, they computed that the six thousand armed and furnished in Devon and Cornwall, with the assistance of those in Wiltshire, Dorset and Somersetshire, would make a sufficient army, strengthened with the gentlemen, their retinue, and others of the neighbouring counties, to be incorporated, tho' not so compleatly armed; and if by resistance, or contrary weather, the enemy pass over Plymouth, and land at Portland; then the army of the west shall repair to them. If the invasion happen upon Kent, or other part to the west of the Thames, then the midland-shires directed to assist the west, may turn to the east along the coast. If the army in Flanders land to the east of the Thames, the same order to be taken with Suffolk, Norfolk, Sussex, and the city of London. And because special regard was to be had to her majesty's person, an army should be provided, and commanded under counties reserved for that end, to join the forces of London and others, to be armed out of her majesty's stores. Further, for the increase of footmen wanting armour, among one fourth of the able unarmed men, eighty should be pikes, and twenty bill-men, and those weapons speedily to be provided, they being furnished by the realm. And for the increase of pike-men in this scarcity of armour, that the bill-men be converted into pike-men, and that able bill-men unarm'd should be levied in their places; because the ranks of bill-men in order to battle are always environ'd with pike-men; for the bill-men serve specially for execution, if the enemy be overthrown: only a few armed bill-men or halberdiers reserved to guard the ranks wherein the ensigns, drums, &c. are plac'd. And because, on a sudden invasion, 'twill be too late to provide necessities; store of ordinance, munition, and all other furniture, to be forthwith provided and sent to the foresaid garrisons. Also that horse as well as foot be exercised in those general assemblies; and that at Plymouth, Portsmouth, Sandwich, or other places thought fit to have the like training, the horse-men of the next counties be also brought together; as at Plymouth, those of Devon, Cornwall, and Somersetshire; at Portland, those of Dorset, Wilts, Hampshire, and Berkshire; and at Sandwich, those of Kent, Sussex, and Surrey. And because in these places for training the infantry, there may want forage and conveniences for horse-men, the lieutenants may chuse the fittest for the cavalry as near the foot as they can. But as they cannot resist the landing in Scotland, they propos'd six thousand foot and two thousand horse, whereof one thousand to be lances, for that side. And if these shall be thought too weak for the army in Flanders when it lands there, a good part of the army appointed to guard her majesty may be detach'd to join the army in the north, and the army of the west march up to supply their charge. They also consider'd the king of Spain's hopes in the papists and malecontents; and that if those small regiments were not in readiness, 'twould be too late to assemble, both for resisting a foreign enemy and withstanding these at home in one day; for every man would rest in fear of having his own house fir'd, and his family destroy'd ; therefore, if they made any stir, severe execution upon such offenders should be used by martial law. Further, that it should be bruited in Spain, a vast army of double or treble the number was ready in the west, and other coasts of England, to embark for Portugal or the Indies ; the same opinion being fortify'd by the preparation of so many ships making ready in those parts by Sir Francis Drake. They also thought, that throughout all the counties of England the proportion among the armed and trained as well as unarmed pikes and bills, should be eighty pikes and twenty bills in every hundred. And lastly, caution'd the lords of the council to be wary of her majesty's ships lying at Rocheſter.

BESIDES this grand scheme for the safeguard of the kingdom in general, Raleigh seems to have had some special regard to several particular places. For there has been found among the lord Burghley's papers, a remembrance for the lord-treasurer, touching the request of Sir W. R. dated it seems this year : which makes request for five pieces of brass cannon lying at Woolwich ; also for letters to the marquis of Winchester, lieutenant of Dorsetshire, for a hundred men and arms to defend the castle and island of Portland, with a supply of powder, there being but one left. Further, for removal of the unserviceable ordnance there to London ; and that the lord marquis would give order for his said hundred men, by his commission directed to the lieutenant of Portland ; and he will undertake to collect men of sufficiency, not of the trained number. Lastly, for his lordship's good remembrance for the towns of Weymouth and Melcomb-Regis. From whence my author is not only inclin'd to believe this paper was sent by Sir Walter Raleigh, but that he was now governor of Portland castle, and had those towns under his care.<sup>a</sup> We may indeed hence believe this paper was written by him ; and that he not only took those places, but several others, under his consideration, that they might be put in the best state of defence : but that he was now governor of Portland castle, or limited to the defence of that place at the time of the invasion, as might be imply'd from my author, seems not very consistent with his lieutenancy in the west.

BUT as much engaged as Raleigh seems at this time to have been for the safety of the kingdom, he found some interval to consider also upon means for the relief of his colony : for after governor White return'd, and had deliver'd him his letters, with other advertisements concerning his late voyage, and the state of the planters in Virginia, Raleigh immediately appointed a pinnace to be sent thither, with all such provisions as he apprehended they might want ; and also wrote letters to them, promising that he would prepare a good supply of shipping and men, with all other necessaries, to be with them the summer following. This pinnace and fleet he accordingly prepared at Biddeford in the west of England, under the command of Sir Richard Grenvill ; and all things being now ready, they waited only for a fair wind. In the mean time, the alarm so increas'd throughout all England, of that vast and formidable armament made by the king of Spain, under the sanction of the pope's Crusado, for the invasion and conquest of the whole island ; that most of the ships of war then in any readiness, receiv'd orders from the state to attend in their harbours for the defence of their own country : and Sir Richard Grenvill was personally commanded not to depart out of Cornwal. Governor White nevertheless labour'd so earnestly for the relief of the colony, that he obtain'd two small pinnaces, call'd the Brave and the Roe, wherein fifteen planters, and all convenient provisions for those who winter'd in the country, were transported ; but the names of the captains who commanded those vessels are not remember'd. On the 22d of April 1588, they put over the bar at Biddeford, and the same night came to anchor at the isle of Lundy ; but the company, minding more to make a gainful voyage than a safe one, run in chase of prizes ; till at last one of them was met with by a couple of strong men of war of Rochelle, about fifty leagues to the north-east of Madera ; where, after a bloody fight, the English were beaten, boarded and rifled. But it is observable, the French men were so immoderate in possessing themselves of their spoil, that, by over-loading the boats with the freight of the English ships, they sunk what they were too eager to share ; so the vice, which led them to conquest, being it self unconquer'd, they lost by their greediness what they had won by their strength. In this maimed, ransack'd and ragged condition, the said ship return'd to England in a month's time ; and about three weeks after returned the other, having perhaps tasted of the same fare ; at least without performing the intended voyage ; to the distress of the planters abroad, and displeasure of their patron at home.<sup>b</sup>

In the mean time the king of France sent queen Elizabeth a message, assuring her, that the tempest, which had been gathering in Spain for three years, would certainly break very speedily upon her kingdom ; therefore advised her to make the best preparation she could for its defence. Nor did the king of Spain keep it now any longer a secret, having about the same time, that is, in the month of May this year, publish'd at Lisbon an ample and ostentatious account<sup>a</sup> of this Invincible Armada, as the Spaniards themselves had call'd it; wherein the squadrons are distinguish'd according to the several provinces; the names of the ships, their burden, and their commanders; with the number of their foldiers, mariners, and other associates and adventurers; their stores, and all other necessaries, likewise specified: whence it appears the whole fleet consisted of a hundred and thirty, or, according to Sir Walter Raleigh<sup>b</sup> and Hugo Grotius,<sup>c</sup> a hundred and forty sail; some few tenders, or others, joining them by the way, not being perhaps in the Spanish list reckon'd: carrying, by the generality of accounts, above twenty-six hundred pieces of brass and iron ordnance;<sup>d</sup> near nineteen thousand foldiers; between eight and nine thousand sailors; besides officers, priests, galley-slaves, servants, and other attendants; amounting in all to about thirty thousand persons; or, according to the confession of Don Diego Pimentelli, one of their own commanders, who was driven into Zealand, the whole fleet, army, &c. were no less than thirty-two thousand men; and cost the king of Spain 30000 ducats every day.<sup>e</sup> The general of this mighty navy was the duke of Medina Sidonia, knight of the golden fleece; and John Martines de Ricalde was chief admiral. In Flanders the prince of Parma was also making great preparations to join this Armada; had gather'd up an army consisting of more than a hundred, some say two hundred companies of foot, and four thousand horse; and was very busy in making rafts, ferry-boats, floating bridges, portcullices, gabions, and what not? Nor were they idle in England; for how well the directions of the council of war aforesaid were put in execution, and how far Raleigh may be presum'd to have been engag'd among the most indefatigable in this service, is to be infer'd from the words of that author, who says, "In a very short time the whole kingdom and every corner were speedily furnish'd with armed people on horseback and on foot; and those continually trained, exercised, and put into bands in such warlike manner, as in no age ever was before in this realm." And a little further, "That all concur'd in one mind, to be in readiness to serve for the realm; and some one country was able to make a sufficient army of twenty thousand men fit to fight, and fifteen thousand of them well arm'd and weapon'd: and in some countries the number of forty thousand able men: that the maritime countries from Cornwal all along southward to Kent, and from thence eastward to Lincolnshire, were so furnish'd with soldiers, both of themselves, and with resort from their next shires, as there was no place to be doubted for landing of any foreign forces, but there were within forty-eight hours to come to the place above twenty thousand fighting men on horseback and on foot, with all manner of ammunition, provision, and carriages, under the principal nobles of the countries, and captains of the greatest knowledge." We further learn from the same author and others, that besides these armies for the maritime countries, the city of London exercised before the queen ten thousand men, and had several thousands more in readiness; that there were also two great armies rais'd, whereof one was encamp'd at Tilbury in Essex, between the city and the mouth of the Thames, consisting of twenty-two thousand foot and a thousand horse, under the command of the earl of Leicester. The queen review'd this camp several times, din'd, made orations in it, and lodged in the borders of it.<sup>f</sup> The other army, consisting of thirty-four thousand foot and two thousand horse, <sup>a</sup> It is entitled, La Felicissima Armada que el Rey Felipe nuestro señor mando juntar en el Puerto de la ciudad de Lisboa en el Reyno de Portugal; en el Anno de Mil e quinientos y ochenta y ocho. Escrita por Pedro de Pos Salas. It was translated into English the same year by Daniel Archdeacon, under the title of A Discourse of that Armada which the king of Spain caused to be assembled in the haven of Lisbon in the kingdom of Portugal, in the year 88, against England; the which began to go out of the haven the 29th and 30th of May. See an abstract of this pamphlet in Hakluyt (out of Van Meteren) vol. 1. fol. 592. But one of Mr. Lediard's lists in his Naval Expedition, now publishing, folio 252. raises them to 145. the author of a letter sent out of England to Don Bernardino Mendoza, ambassador in France for the king of Spain, 4to. 1588, l. 17, their number was 150. Also Van Meteren, the Dutch historian's relation of this invasion, in Hakluyt, vol. 1. fol. 593, agrees in that number; but a little further reckons them at 134. And Stowe's History of this advance, the Spanish fleet to 130 ships.

But the accounts above, especially of the Spaniards themselves at the very time, seem most credible: for in the examination of one of the Spanish prisoners, named Emanuel Fremosa, on the 12th of September this year, I find he confess'd, that they were, at their coming forth from Spain, 135 sail. Thus in a scarce tract, entitled, Certain Advertisements out of Ireland, concerning the losses and distresses happen'd to the Spanish navy, 4to. 1588, in the Harleian library, B. II.

<sup>d</sup> Sir Walter Raleigh has made some good observations upon this plenty of Spanish guns, which there will be occasion hereafter more particularly to recite.

commanded by the lord Hunsdon, was planted about the queen's own person.<sup>a</sup> And it increas'd daily by the several bands and troops, which were led from the inland countries by such noblemen, knights, and gentlemen, as had no special charge or government in their respective counties; while the young earl of Essex, and others among them, entertain'd her majesty with tiltings and tourneys, barriers, mock-fights, and such-like arts, as in publick are wont to render men popular.<sup>b</sup> But the lieutenants of the maritime counties were otherwise employ'd. And as the earl of Pembroke had been assiduous in levying the forces of Wilts and Somersetshire, and the earl of Bath those of Devonshire; so Raleigh seems to have been no less forward and industrious in raising and reducing those of Cornwal to the best order and discipline for the service of his country, against the common enemy; notwithstanding what he might have done, as has been said before, at Portland: and, like the rest of the lords-lieutenant, to have sent up constantly his certificates to the queen of the numbers that were assembled; the posture they were in; the provisions they were supply'd with; or those whereof they stood in need.

Invasion.

BUT notwithstanding all these land-preparations, which moved some speculative warriors at court to think a sea-force unnecessary, as if the English were sufficient to cut the Spaniards to pieces in landing, or when they were ashore, and run away with their ships at the same time; Sir Walter Raleigh knew better what another kingdom might do, even against England, by the advantage of a fleet, if we have none: no man having so solidly resolv'd as himself that weighty question, whether England, without the help of a fleet, is able to debar an enemy from landing? He knew that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily out-run the soldiers that coast them: he knew that a fleet after sun-set may be seen at the Lizard, and by the next morning at Portland, which an army should be six days in marching; and consequently, that the sailor may chuse his landing-place, where there are no soldiers that can oppose him: and even supposing an invader should offer to land near where our greatest army was ready to receive him, Raleigh doubted, when the choice of all our train'd-bands and of officers were drawn together, as at Tilbury, to attend the person of the queen, and to defend the city of London, whether those that should remain to guard the coast could be of any such force as to encounter an army like that which the prince of Parma should have landed in England.<sup>c</sup>

By sea therefore all possible defence was likewise made, and the chief command was very properly confer'd on the lord-admiral Howard, who, hearing the Invincible Armada was upon the point of hoisting sail, sent Sir Francis Drake, who was constituted his vice-admiral, with fifty-six ships well appointed, to the western parts, and himself arrived there on the 23d of May with others, which made up the fleet about a hundred sail; while the lord Henry Seymer was sent to lie with forty English and Dutch ships (according to Camden) between Dover and Calais to intercept the prince of Parma.<sup>d</sup> The Invincible Armada loosed anchor from Lisbon four days before; but met with such storms, sickness, and other disasters, that the lord-admiral put forth towards Spain, in hopes of surprising them in their distress; till more maturely considering they might pass by undiscover'd, he return'd to Plymouth, and suffer'd his men to relieve <sup>a</sup> But six years before this occasion of raising the military strength of England, according to Sir Walter Raleigh, there were, upon a general view and muster, found in the kingdom, of all men fit to bear arms, eleven hundred and seventy-two thousand. See his Select essays and observations 8vo. 1650, in his discourse of the invention of shipping, p. 27.

<sup>b</sup> The earl of Essex was now master of the queen's horse. See the letter to Mendoza aforesaid, p. 25. In which Sir Henry Wotton agrees, who makes this further observation: "This service at Tilbury camp was, in my judgment (says he) the very poison of all that followed; for there, while the queen stood in some doubt of the Spanish invasion, she made him in field, commander of the cavalry, as he was before in court, and much graced him openly in view of the soldiers and people, even above my lord of Leicester: the truth is, from thenceforth he sed too fast." Parallel between Robert Devereux earl of Essex, and George Villiers duke of Buckingham.

<sup>d</sup> As for the naval force in these times, William Harrison, in his Historical description of England (with whom Sir Walter Raleigh in his Essays aforesaid agrees) tells us, the queen had then in the 24th year of her reign (six years before this invasion) already built and furnished four or five and twenty great ships (whose names they both recite) and three notable galleys; with the sight whereof, and the rest of the navy royal, says Harrison, it is incredible to see how greatly her grace is delighted. They further say, there were then 135 ships more, whose burden exceeded 500 ton; besides many more of lesser burden, boys, &c. Harrison also observes, her grace doth yearly build one ship or other to the better defence of her frontiers from the enemy. See him in the 2d vol. of Holinshed, fol. 201.

Michael Castellan, who was ambassador here many years in those times, and who has given the most noble and ingenuous character of the said queen, in his memoirs, of any foreigner I have met with that knew her, comes so near that author, where he observes she built a noble fleet, the bulwark of her kingdom, as to affirm, she launches a large man of war every second year. But by that long list of the English navy (which this year opposed the Spanish Armada) among the MSS. in the Royal Library 14. B. XIII. lately printed by Mr. Lediard, in his Naval Expeditions, fol. 238. it appears there were very few ships of that burden before-mention'd among them. For tho' that list raises their number beyond all other accounts, to 197 sail (manifestly omitting some which were there, and probably admitting several which were not;) yet there are not above six ships among them mention'd to be of 500 ton, and not above seven of greater burden. Therefore, as Mr. Lediard well observes, tho' our several squadrons might exceed those of the Spaniards in number of ships; yet by comparing the tonnage of the several ship in both fleets, and the number of men employ'd in them, the superiority of the enemy's fleet will appear very considerable; more than double in men, and very near double in burden.

themselves on shore. The queen had received such assurance they were so disabled from coming this year by that storm, that she made secretary Walsingham send for four of her first-rate ships to be brought home to Chatham. But their return was prevented by the intelligence which captain Thomas Fleming brought into the harbour on the 19th of July, that he had discover'd the enemy approaching from the Lizard-Point in Cornwal. The captains and commanders were then it seems at bowls upon the Hoe at Plymouth; <sup>a</sup> and the tradition goes, that Drake would needs see the game up; but was soon prevail'd on to go and play out the rubbers with the Spaniards. All hands were now at work to warp out the ships, which, with the admirable industry of the seamen, was very speedily, for the difficulty thereof, perform'd, the wind blowing stiffly into the haven from the south-west. The lord-admiral, with the few he could then get ready, lay all night in the road. Next day about fifty or threescore more join'd him, and at noon they ken'd the Spanish fleet; some with lofty turrets and decks rear'd one above another; and others rowed along with two or three hundred oars apiece; all advancing with their Spanish gravity, the wind being abated, in a semicircular order; and extended, as Camden observes, seven miles from end to end. The English suffered them all to pass by, so got the advantage of the wind, when they began to chase them in the rear: nor did the Spaniards offer to land at Plymouth, their commission being to join the prince of Parma, and sail directly to London. The next day, which was the 21st of July, the lord-admiral sent out a pinnace call'd the Defiance, and begun the fight. This, I take it, was near the Eddystone; for there we have account of the first conflict, and of the first Spanish ship that was taken or sunk. <sup>b</sup> Then the lord-admiral in the Ark-Royal, Drake in the Revenge, with Hawkins, Frobisher, and others, having thunder'd thick upon the enemy for two hours together, withdrew, forty of their ships not being (says Camden) yet come up. In this engagement the Spaniards, by endeavouring to circle in and shelter one of their disabled galleons, she had her foremast broken, and was left behind, which Drake took the next day, with Don Pedro de Valdez and other nobles in her, besides fifty-five thousand ducats, which were shar'd among his sailors. Immediately after, another of their greatest ships was set on fire, with all the people in her, and yet the powder escaped. But how the lord-admiral, all the first night, follow'd the Spanish lantern, instead of Drake's, into their fleet, while Drake at the same time was making another mistaken pursuit; and how the Ark Royal followed the Spanish fleet also the second night, so far, almost alone, that it was the afternoon following before the English fleet overtook her, with other particulars; I leave to the more ample accounts of this engagement, that I may attend the motions of Sir Walter Raleigh; who, from being at first the nearest, now growing impatient at being the most remote from the enemy, appears to have committed his charge by land to proper officers, or detach'd part thereof to march up nearer the Spaniards, and with a gallant company of nobles and gentlemen, in several ships, to have join'd the English fleet; that is to say, on the 23d of July, when the Spanish fleet was advanced over-against Portland; where, this whole day being one continued engagement from morning till night, it proved the most general and bloody fight of any between them in the British channel: and here, after the taking of a great Venetian ship, and others of lesser bulk, the Spaniards were driven from all intention of assaulting the English, till they had join'd the prince of Parma; for during this fight, or, “in the mean while” (according to the words of my author, from Van Meteran, one of the earliest, most copious and accurate journalists of this expedition) “the English navy increas'd; where- unto, out of all havens of the realm, resorted ships and men; for they all with one accord came flocking thither (to Portland) as unto a set field where immortal fame and glory was to be attain'd, and faithful service to be perform'd unto their prince and country.” <sup>c</sup> In which number having mention'd the earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, he also names Sir Walter Raleigh among the foremost of near twenty other knights and gentlemen, whereby the English ships were augmented to a hundred sail; and doubtless by some of those Camden mention'd to have been left behind in Plymouth-Sound, with which Raleigh very probably advanced. <sup>d</sup> These, ever afunder, and always in motion, were on every side useful to annoy the enemy; now presenting a broad-side, and sheering off; then tacking about and discharging the other; in such sort, that Sir Henry Wotton call'd it a Morrice-dance upon the waters, “while the sluggish and unweildy castles of the enemy cluster'd and hamper'd together, could only offer offence from one disabled side; and that, when they had done, flew over the English mens heads. Camden tells us, that in this day's engagement, the lord-admiral was advised by some of his officers, with more heat than discretion, to grapple with and board the enemy. Now Raleigh, having made some excellent animadversions upon this very circumstance, goes nigh to prove out of his own words, that he was not only in this day's engagement; but that the counsel he might thence appear to have given, did greatly contribute to the success of it. He has shewn how well he knew, that in such case the advantage of weapons would be likeliest to carry it, whereof the enemy was provided with far the greatest number; also, that in such close fight, how liable the lesser ships were to be crush'd by the greater; that these by their very height must have further advantage over those that endeavour'd to board them from below; and lastly, in these of more bulk and breadth being also more firm and more steady, those who could best keep their feet would probably be best able to use their hands. But that I may not impede too much the course of action, his further arguments upon this head are subjoyn'd more closely in his own words.<sup>a</sup> Next day the Spaniards were glad to lie by, and the English no less pleased with the cessation, that they might take the opportunity of sending to shore for a recruit of ammunition; and this, being a circumstance taken notice of also by Raleigh himself, further confirms his having been now among them.<sup>b</sup> The 25th of July, the English had another sharp battel with the Spanish admiral, and three great galleasses at the isle of Wight, in which Camden mentions the taking of a Portuguese galleon, and that from this time the galleasses durst not venture upon any new engagement, but closing themselves up again in a rundel as they call'd it, made the best of their way to tell the prince of Parma how they had been served. The English fleet followed and kept playing upon their rear all the next day, having determined to forbear any closer engagement till they came to the British Frith, or streights of Calais, where the lord Seymer expected their arrival. "But so far was this Invincible Armada from alarming the sea-coasts, says Camden, that the English gentry of the younger sort enter'd themselves volunteers, and, leaving their friends and families, did with incredible cheerfulness hire ships at their own charge, and in pure love to their country joyn'd the grand fleet in vast numbers." And here Camden names those nobles and some of those gentlemen, with Raleigh among them, which compos'd the squadron before-mentioned, as if it enter'd but now from Dover, or some of those ports; not that he confines their entrance to this day, otherwise than naming them under it, or any other way suggests, they did not joyn the grand fleet three days before; but seems, by remembering them in this place, to have believed, they were most conspicuous or in greatest number at this time, unless he postpon'd the mention of them to a day, that was least throng'd with circumstances of action. Indeed, that this noble squadron of vo-

<sup>d</sup> What further persuades me to believe Raleigh enter'd the fleet at this place and time is, my having met with a certain foreign history, hereafter mention'd, which had been his own book, and wherein he has with his own hand corrected other passages relating to himself: but has let this of his joining the fleet, as above, pass uncontradicted.

<sup>a</sup> "Certainly he, that will happily perform a fight at sea, must be skillful in making choice of vessels to fight in: he must believe, that there is more belonging to a good man of war upon the waters than great daring; and must know, that there is a great deal of difference between fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The guns of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together without consideration, belongs rather to a mad-man than to a man of war; for by such ignorant bravery was Peter Strozzi lost at the Azores, when he fought against the marquis of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the lord Charles Howard, admiral of England, been lost in 1588, if he had not been better advised, than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an army aboard them, and he had none; they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he entangled himself with those great and powerful vessels, he had greatly endangered this kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defence are equal to a hundred that board and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had a hundred for twenty of ours to defend themselves withal. But our admiral knew his advantage, and held it; which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Here to speak in general of sea-fights (continues he, tho' I think his observation may have respect to some further events in this particular fight, wherefore 'tis here also added) "I say, that a fleet of twenty ships, all good sailors and good ships, have the advantage on the open sea of a hundred as good ships, but of slower sailing. For if the fleet of a hundred sail keep themselves together in a gross squadron, the twenty ships upon any angle shall force them to give ground and to fall back upon their own next fellows, of which so many an entangle are made unserviceable or lost. Force them they may easily; because twenty ships, which give themselves scope, after they have given one broad-side of artillery by clapping into the wind and staying, may give them the other, and so the twenty ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual volley, whereas those that fight in a troop have no room to turn, and can always use but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of a hundred sail give themselves any distance, then shall the lesser fleet prevail, either against those that are arrear and hindmost, or against those that, by advantage of over-tailing their fellows, keep the wind: and, if upon a lee-shore, the ships next the wind will be constrained to fall back into their own squadron; then it is all to nothing, that the whole fleet must suffer ship-wreck, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of unequal speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time, as by that oration of Hermocrates in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians when the Athenians invaded them, it may be easily observed. History of the World, Book 5. chap. 1. sect. 6.

<sup>b</sup> Speaking of the superfluity of great ordnance in the royal navy; he observes, that "many times there is no proportion of shot and powder allowed, rateably to that quantity of great ordnance, as was seen in the sea-battel, says he, with the Spaniards in the year 1588, when it so nearly concerned the defence and preservation of the kingdom. So as then many of those great guns, wanting powder and shot, stood but as cyphers and scare-crows, not unlike to the Easterling hulks, who were wont to plant great red port-holes in their broad-sides where they carried no ordnance at all." See Sir Walter Raleigh's observations on the royal navy and sea-service, inscribed to Henry, prince of Wales, 8vo 1650. p. 26.

lunteers was united to the queen's navy, when such valiant services were perform'd against the Spaniards in the great fight before Calais, another writer also, greatly to their commendation, agrees; but neither is he so expressive as to satisfy us, it was the first appearance they made, and that they were not before at Portland. For, having mentioned the earls of Cumberland, Northumberland, and other gentlemen of distinction, who without any charge or knowledge of the queen, joyn'd the fleet before Calais, and ventur'd their lives in the said engagement; he goes on to observe, how earnest all ranks and degrees were; by instancing also, "that the earl of Oxford, one of the most ancient nobles in this land, went to sea and served the queen among them, as did Robert Cecil, lord Dudley and Sir Walter Raleigh, a gentleman of the queen's privy-chamber, says he, and in his company a great number of young gentlemen, among whom were William Cecil, Edward Darcie, and Arthur Gorge,"<sup>a</sup> the same persons mentioned with others by Camden, and also in larger number by the Dutch historian above quoted, three days before. "With the recital of whom, I only shew you (continues my last author, the letter-writer) how far we have been deceived to think, that we should have had a party here for us, when, as you behold, both by land and sea, all sorts of men were so ready, at their own charges, without either commandment or entertainment, to adventure also their lives in defence of the queen and the realm."<sup>b</sup> From hence it appears, this squadron must have also been at the final overthrow of the Spanish Armada, which on the 27th of July in the evening anchor'd before Calais, intending to hold on for Dunkirk, in expectation of the prince of Parma, who was always preparing but never ready, and, the English following, anchor'd also within culvering shot of them. Here the lord Seymer joyn'd the English; and then the lord-admiral's fleet was increased to a hundred and forty sail, says Camden; wherein he both exactly agrees with the augmentation thereof at Portland by these volunteers, as we have it from the Dutch historian there quoted; and also excludes all intermediate addition, of ships at least, by the number himself has before given us of the lord Seymer's squadron. Next day the English resolv'd, according to the queen's directions, upon the stratagem of the fire-ships to burn or disperse the Spanish navy; and the same was put in practice at or soon after midnight, so successfully, that the enemy, cutting their cables with the utmost horror and precipitancy, were, some scatter'd by the wind, some fell foul of each other, and others struck upon the sands; the English chasing and thundering upon them from all quarters: then was a great galleass taken by captain Preston, its commander Moncada slain, and a booty of near as much gold fell to the conquerors as was taken in another before-mentioned.<sup>c</sup> On the 29th of July the Spaniards ranged themselves into the best order they could within sight of Graveling; hither the English fleet also pursued them, and here the Spaniards received their last fatal adieu, by incessant and numberless damages from the English cannon the greatest part of the day, till their Galleons, Galleasses, Gallies, Urcas and Zabras were so miserably shatter'd, having their hulls pierced through and through, their oars and rudders cut away, their tackling all rent, and their masts broken, that some were deserted as unserviceable, some sunk with the crew that was in them, and others retiring upon the neighbouring coasts were seized and plundered by the inhabitants: while those, that had the ability left them, most prudently employ'd it in running away. The English still followed them into the northern seas, even beyond the latitude of fifty-seven degrees, and, leaving them past all thoughts of the prince of Parma, return'd on the 4th of August; when the violent storms that arose resumed their cause, and compleated their victory: for, by the tempests, shipwrecks, sickness and famine in their dangerous passage homewards, they sustained greater losses than even all they had met with throughout the narrow seas. For the particulars of those losses we shall refer to the distinct and more copious narratives of this invasion,<sup>d</sup> and close this account with the summary thereof, which was soon after published to the world

<sup>c</sup> "It was affirmed by men of great judgment in Calais, that never was seen by any man living such a battery; so great for number, so furious, and of so long continuance, as the English made against the Spanish: Calais saw the Spanish navy first driven from their anchors with fire; they saw the greatest galleass of the Spanish, whereof was commander that worthy nobleman Moncada, spoil'd, and himself slain in it by the English: Calais saw the next day, that the English fought and beat the Armada from eight a clock in the morning till four in the afternoon without ceasing: Calais saw the Spanish hoist up all their sails and fly as fast as the wind could drive, and the English pursue them: Yet Calais saw a sufficient navy of England left before Dunkirk, able to master all the shipping that the duke of Parma had provided." Thus in a scarce old tract in the Harleian library, B. H. called, A Pack of Spanish lyes, first printed in Spain, translated, and now ripped up, unfolded and condemn'd, 4to. 1588. p. 6.

<sup>d</sup> At the end of an old pamphlet before quoted, called, Certain Advertisements out of Ireland, concerning the losses and distresses of the Spanish navy, there is one list of fifteen Spanish ships, which perished, or were taken by the English in July and August in the narrow seas; and another list of seventeen more, sunk, burnt and taken on the coasts of Ireland in September; so that both losses were thirty-two ships, in which were also destroy'd and taken 10185 men, whereof one thousand were detain'd prisoners in England and Zealand; further adding, there were multitudes besides slain, sunk, or starved, who were not accounted for. Inasmuch, as Van Metoan in Hakluyt more distinctly compute, with whom, I observe, most of our historians agree, there returned not home above fifty-three world by Sir Walter Raleigh himself, * where giving the honour of the victory to the courage and conduct of the lord-admiral Howard, he says, that “ notwithstanding the victories they pretended to have obtained, it was soon manifested to all nations, how the navy, which they had termed invincible, consisting of a hundred and forty sail, was by thirty of the queen’s ships of war, and a few merchant-men, beaten and shuffled together, even from the Lizard point in Cornwall to Portland, where they shamefully left Don Pedro de Valdez with his mighty ship; from Portland to Calais, where they lost Hugo de Moncada, with the gallies of which he was captain; and from Calais, driven with squibs from their anchors, were chased out of the sight of England round about Scotland and Ireland; where, for the sympathy of their barbarous religion, hoping to find succour and assistance, a great part of them were crush’d against the rocks; and those other who landed (being very many in number) were notwithstanding broken, slain, and taken; and so sent from village to village, coupled in halters, to be shipped into England; where her majesty, of her princely and invincible disposition, disdaining to put them to death, and scorning either to retain or entertain them, they were all sent back again to their own country, to witness and recount the worthy achievements of their invincible navy.”

THE services of Sir Walter Raleigh against this invasion, his diligence in regulating the forces of the land, and his interest in strengthening those of the sea; the charges he was at, and the dangers he voluntarily incurr’d, however undistinguish’d more than is above express’d by our common historians, and those few inaccurate accounts thereof, which are descended to us; were yet received with such approbation by the queen, that she seems, as some recompence for them, to have this year made a considerable augmentation to his patent of wines; as if he had, besides the grant before-mentioned, another now also bestowed upon him for tonnage and poundage upon those liquors, <sup>b</sup> except it is the same patent with the former, only renewed this year, or wrong dated in the author who mentions it. Be it as it should, this patent seems to have been one of the most beneficial favours which Raleigh ever received of the queen, and might perhaps exceed in profit the pension which she settled on the lord-admiral himself for his conduct and courage in the said overthrow. This benefit Raleigh enjoy’d as long as she liv’d; tho’, towards the close of her reign, the number of such-like grants to others being very much increased, they were inveighed against in parliament as grievous and burdensome monopolies, by those especially, who had not the merit or interest to procure any for themselves. Sir Robert Naunton tells us, in his conclusion of Raleigh’s character, with relation to the grants he thus obtain’d; “ That tho’ he gained much at the court, yet he took it not out of the exchequer, or merely out of the queen’s purse, but by his wit, and the help of the prerogative: for the queen was never profuse in delivering out her treasures; but paid many, and most of her servants, part in money and the rest with grace.” <sup>c</sup> We meet with another office, which Raleigh himself erected, no less praise-worthy than this was profitable to him. For one writer, in the short account he gives of him, having spoken of the division he made of his time, in allowing five hours to sleep, four to reading, two for discourse, and the rest to business and other necessities, and having hinted at the diversity of his correspondencies, intelligence and the like, says, that “ in the capacity of an agency for all sorts of persons, he set up a kind of office of address.” And further, “ that considering the dispatch of such variety of engagements in the former part of his life, one must be much to seek how a man of so three sail, leaving also behind the greater and better part of their men; and, as they all conclude, There was not a famous or worthy family in all Spain, which in this expedition lost not a son, a brother, or a kinsman.

Among the English, there were not in the whole eight or nine days engagement above one hundred lost, and among them only one captain, named Cock by Camden; Fuller, in his worthies of Devon, laments mightily, that he cannot recover his christian name; but perhaps Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 771, might have helped him to it; however, the Cottonian MS. quoted by Mr. Lediard, fol. 256. puts the matter further in doubt, by calling him William Cope, and his pinnace the Delight; which William Cope is more likely to be William Cox, who did command such a vessel of fifty tun, called the Delight, in the said fleet, according to the list, which this ingenious gentleman himself has exhibited; unless Camden’s Cock is this Cox, and so his name may be William; tho’ it will then differ from the person offer’d out of Hakluyt, who is named Abraham. But, as the person of this christian name is there only mentioned in a former expedition, tho’ his surname agrees best with the person who was lost in this, it is left to the reader’s judgment, whether he will prefer this Abraham Cock, or that William Cox, to the honourable memory that captain Cock in Camden deserves for dying in defence of his country.

Here I cannot but wonder, how the industrious Mr. Styve was led to say in his Annals, vol. 3. fol. 530. that this brief relation above-quoted of the Spanish invasion was penn’d by Sir Francis Drake, of whose writing I never saw any thing in print or MS. but some letters; tho’ he quotes even the very page in Hakluyt, whence he takes it, as I do; and where the said Report, in which that relation is included, is expressly said to be penn’d by the honourable Sir Walter Raleigh.

“ many actions should write any thing, and one of so many writings should do any thing.”<sup>a</sup> By another little hint, that has been elsewhere preserved, we may conceive this office did chiefly respect a more liberal intercourse, a nobler mutuality of advertisement, than would perhaps admit of all sorts of persons; and such as advanced rather to the improvement of men themselves, than their means. But this suggestion is drawn only from comparing it with the general tendency of those other schemes, among which I once saw it mentioned, in a letter written by an ingenious person of great note for his writings to a nobleman, who had the greatest correspondence with such persons of any in his time; recommending “ that long dried fountain of communication, which Montaigne first propos’d, Sir Walter Raleigh put in practice, and Mr. Hartlib endeavoured to revive.”<sup>b</sup> This is all that occurs to me of this office of address: but whatever useful means of this nature, for advancing the knowledge or interest of mankind, was instituted by Raleigh, ’twas probably in some less active part of his life, than at this present juncture.

For Don Antonio, king of Portugal, who had been expell’d from his dominions by king Philip, and was now in London, soon after the signal overthrow of the Armada aforesaid, took this opportunity to renew his motion to queen Elizabeth for her assistance towards his restoration, which he propounded to the lord-treasurer in a letter full of liberal offers, written in the Portuguese language, all with his own hand.<sup>c</sup> The queen not only consented to the enterprise, as thinking it more convenient to return the late visit of the Spaniards in their own country, than suffer them to repeat it here, but lent six of her men of war, and disbursed three-score thousand pounds towards defraying the charges thereof. This encouragement, and the late provocation, so spirited up the warlike men of the kingdom, and Raleigh among the rest to become volunteers therein, that they augmented the number of the said ships with a hundred and twenty sail more, and mann’d them with fourteen or fifteen thousand soldiers and sailors at their own further expence, committing the charge by sea to Sir Francis Drake, and that by land to Sir John Norris, who were probably the most considerable contributors thereto.

But first Raleigh took care for the relief of his plantation in Virginia, which that he might more effectually secure than could be expected from his own single assistance, especially after the many heavy disbursements he had made, and the great disappointment the colony must doubtless have received by missing of the last supplies he sent them, through the losses, which his agents too rashly brought thereon; he made an assignment to divers gentlemen and merchants of London, for continuing the plantation of this new discover’d country with English men. And this was now no less advisedly done with regard to himself, than affectionately with respect to the people employ’d therein: whom, tho’ he generously assisted with his advice and interest

<sup>b</sup> This letter, written by John Evelyn, Esq; about forty years past, in a little black hand as I remember, to Henry earl of Clarendon, I saw among the remains of that earl’s most numerous and expensive collections, about eleven years since, at which time I made the extract above out of it. And, as I have met with the projects of those other persons mentioned in that letter with Sir Walter Raleigh, for this commodious interchange and accomplishment of human researches; the recital of theirs may probably reflect a further light into the nature of his; and possibly quicken the publick spirit of some times or other for bringing to perfection the important and extensive benefits, which are so many ways to be apprehended from such a commodious and desirable intercourse. Montaigne’s project (or his father’s) was for having an office of enquiry in several towns, for every body to register what they were in search or want of, with their terms, ’tis suppos’d, for obtaining it. “ Car à tous coups, says he, il y a des conditions qui s’entrecherchent; & pour ne s’entr’entendre, laissent les hommes en extreme nécessité. ” There are, says he, ever more conditions, which are hunting after one another; and for want of hearing one another’s occasions, leave men in very great necessity. ” Then giving an instance of “ those two excellent scholars, Lilius Giraldu in Italy, and Sebastian Castilio in Germany, who died so poor they had scarce bread to eat, he believes thousands would have retained or relieved them, had they known their wants. For the world is not so generally corrupted, but that I knew a man (continues he) who would heartily wish the estate his ancestors had left him, might be employ’d in securing rare and remarkable persons of any kind, from those misfortunes, which sometimes persecute them to the last extremity. ” See his Essays, lib. 1. cap. 34. The other notice of this most useful scheme (since I have not at present Mr. Hartlib’s own account) I shall here offer in Sir William Petty’s ingenious representation of it, directed many years since to the said last projector himself. “ We must recommend, says he, an office of address, according to the projection of Mr. Hartlib, that painful and great instrument of this design; whereby the wants and desires of all may be made known to all. Where men may know what is already done, in the business of learning; what is at present in doing, and what is intended to be done; to the end, that by such a general communication of designs and mutual assistance the wits and endeavours of the world may no longer be as so many scattered coals, which, for want of union, are soon quenched; whereas being but laid together, they would have yielded a comfortable light and heat. For, methinks, the present condition of men is like a field, where, a battel having been lately fought, we see many legs, arms and organs of sense, lying here and there, which, for want of conjunction, and a soul to quicken and enliven them, are fit for nothing but to feed the ravens and infect the air: so we see many wits and ingenuities dispersed up and down the world, whereof some are now labouring to do what is already done; and puzzling themselves to re-invent what is already invented: others we see quite stuck fast in difficulties for want of a few directions, which some other man, might he be met withal, both could and would most easily give him. Again, one man wants a small sum of money to carry on some design that requires it; and there is perhaps another, who has twice as much ready to bestow upon the same design; but these two, having no means ever to hear the one of the other, the good work, intended and desired by both parties, does utterly perish and come to nothing. But this we pass over slightly, tho’ very fundamental to our business; because the master-builder thereof himself has done it so solidly. ” This in a Pamphlet, entitled, The advice of W. P. to Mr. Hartlib, for the advancement of some particular parts of learning, 4to. 1648. p. 1, 2.

As for the expedition before-mentioned, which was set out under Drake and Norris, about five weeks after the said assignment, that is on the 14th of April 1589, in which Don Anto- nio was by Raleigh, among the rest, accompanied to Portugal, we need not here be circumstantial thereon; especially as to the action at the Groine, the overthrow of the Spaniards at Puente de Burgos, the taking of Peniche, with the castle of Cascais, the assault of Lisbon, and the burning of Vigo; seeing our historians have not distinguished what part Raleigh had therein: in which perhaps they seem not so grateful to him as he was to his associates;<sup>d</sup> but particularly in not mentioning him at the taking of that great number of easterling hulks and other ships laden with Spanish goods, provisions and ammunition, for a new invasion of England, which from the 2d of June some or other of the adventurers (none are named) continued to bring into the English fleet, then lying in the road of Cascais, for six days together.<sup>e</sup> This fleet of ours was but thinly mann'd at first, and having lost some thousands by sickness and intemperance with the new wines of those countries; hands could not be spared to bring home much above a quarter of those vessels and their lading, that were thus taken: for Sir Roger Williams, who was a colonel in the land-service of this expedition, has said in a letter of his, still extant, "It is well " known, we had above two hundred sail of all sorts, of which we could not carry with us " above three score for the want of men." Hence arose at their return into England, a little contention between Williams and Raleigh; for Raleigh having taken some of these prizes, Wil- liams placed in one of them his lieutenant with some of his soldiers, "without which, says Wil- liams, it could not have been carried into England:" wherefore he would have laid claim, it seems, both to the ship and its cargo; "this voyage, as he goes on, having cost him a thou“sand pounds,” as it did several other of the adventurers no doubt. But his claim not being thought reasonable, the earl of Bath, lieutenant of Devonshire, discharged his men from that vessel at Dartmouth. Williams, at this, growing very turbulent, and his clamours reaching the queen’s ear, procured her displeasure against him, which occasion’d his said letter to three of the privy-council; whence this intelligence is extracted. From this letter we farther collect, the achievements of the English in this voyage so well satisfy’d the queen, in the disablement of the enemy, especially as to their naval powers, that she honour’d the commanders or chief adventurers therein, and Sir Walter Raleigh among the rest, with a golden chain; for Sir Roger presum’d, the earl of Essex (his great friend, as appears in the histories of this expedition) with the rest who were in the action, would testify, “That I deserve a chain as well as my fellows,” says he.<sup>a</sup> As for the coarse expression which follows, of “Raleigh’s being lying his hulk, as he had done the ark of Noah, the best ship that ever was,” tho’ it may betray some impoliteness of manners and impetuosity of disposition in Sir Roger’s civil capacity; yet in the field, and against an enemy, those rougher qualities might invigorate his courage and experience, and illustrate the military character of the man.

IN the latter end of June this year, and some weeks before this dispute, the English fleet return’d home; but Raleigh appears first to have touch’d upon the coast of Ireland, probably to make a short visit to his feigniory there, and see some of his acquaintance among the new settlements in the province of Munster. We may be pretty well convinc’d that Raleigh was in Ireland this year, from his own writings;<sup>b</sup> and that it was upon his return from a long voyage, out of some verses hereafter following in Spenser the poet. For here we may observe, that while Raleigh was a commander in the Irish wars, under the lord Grey, as we have before related, this Edmund Spenser, then famous for those Pastorals he had newly published, going over secretary to that nobleman, had frequent opportunities, by his ingenuous conversation, so to make his learning and other accomplishments known, as engag’d the friendship of our WORTHY so substantially towards him, that none of the great men in queen Elizabeth’s court, after the death of Sir Philip Sidney, was so great a patron to that extraordinary genius as Sir Walter Raleigh. Indeed the queen her self, in regard that Spenser employ’d his time so commendably in Ireland, as afterwards more publicly appear’d, in the excellent Political View he made of that kingdom, gave him a considerable tract of land out of earl Desmond’s capacious forfeitures, amounting, at the lowest computation that has been made, to three thousand acres of ground, lying in the county of Cork; the preservation and improvement whereof engaged Spenser to settle there; and a pleasant feat he had, at Kilcolman near the river Mulla, which ran through his grounds, and which he has so beautifully describ’d in some of his poems. Here it was in this retirement that Raleigh now paid him a visit, the circumstances whereof Spenser himself has most agreeably celebrated in that poem, which, about two years after this time, he dedicated To the right worthy and noble knight Sir Walter Raleigh, &c. In this dedication he has these forced the enemy’s camp as far as the prince of Parma’s own tent before Venlo, and was that year knighted. He behav’d himself also bravely at Diepe in France 1591; but at Noyon lost many English lives through his rashness. He died 1595, and, as Camden observes, having obtained great knowledge in the arts of war, he might perhaps be allowed not inferior to the best soldiers in that age, could he have put bounds to his courage, which ran quite away with his conduct and discretion. However, as he goes on, for a man of no learning or education, and merely by dint of experience to write such a clear and judicious history of the Low-country wars as he has done, is admir’d at; as also his having so well maintain’d the Modern Discipline, or manner of war, against the antiquated admirers of archery, whereof Sir John Smythe wrote in praise, 4to. 1590. Sir Walter Raleigh has also touch’d upon this military argument in the beginning of his fifth book, and elsewhere, in his History of the world.

<sup>b</sup> Where, speaking of the long lives of the patriarchs, and some of late memory, he says, “I my self knew the old countess of Desmond of Inchequin in Munster, who lived in the year 1589, and many years since; who was married in Edward the fourth’s time, and held her jointure from all the earls of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the nobility and gentlemen of Munster could witness.” History of the world, lib. 1. cap. 5. sect. 5. Of this old lady, see more in lord Bacon’s History of life and death, and Sir William Temple’s Essay on health and long life, in his miscellanies, part 3. (publish’d by Jonathan Swift, M. A. prebendary of St. Patrick’s) 8vo. 1701. p. 125, where, telling us she lived far in king James’s reign, it appears she must have been alive at the time Sir Walter Raleigh was writing that he knew her in Ireland the year aforesaid.

words;

words ; “ I make you present of this simple Pastoral, unworthy of your higher conceipt for “ the meanness of the style, but agreeable with the truth, in circumstance and matter : the
 “ which I humbly beseech you to accept in part of payment of the infinite debt in which I “ acknowledge my self bounden unto you for your singular favours and fundry good turns “ shewed me at my last being in England ; and with your good countenance, protect against “ the malice of evil mouths, which are always wide open to carp at, and misconstrue my firm “ ple meaning.” In the pastoral it self, the poet gives us this description of Raleigh's first ac-costing him in the said rural retirement.

*One day, quoth he, I sat, as was my trade,
 Under the foot of Mole, that mountain bore,
 Keeping my sheep amongst the coolly shade
 Of the green alders by the Mulla's shore ;
 There a strange shepherd chanc'd to find me out,
 Whether allured with my pipe's delight,
 Whose pleasing sound yshrilled far about,
 Or thither led by chance, I knew not right,
 Whom when I asked from what place he came,
 And how he bight ? himself he did ycleep
 The shepherd of the ocean by name,
 And said, he came far from the main-sea deep.
 He sitting me beside in that same shade,
 Provoked me to play some pleasant fit ;
 And when he heard the musick which I made,
 He found himself full greatly pleas'd at it :
 Yet æmuling my pipe, he took in bond
 My pipe, before that æmuled of many,
 And play'd thereon, for well that skill he con'd ;
 Himself as skilful in that art as any.*

It further appears, they now entertain'd each other with some of their poetical compositions ; Spenser rehearsed a pretty tale he had made of the amours between some of his neighbouring rivers ; but Raleigh's muse ran upon a more melancholy strain, which, by the transient view it gives of some little cloud he had lately, but undeservedly, been under at court, lets us into a piece of his secret history ; where the poet tell us,

*His song was all a lamentable lay
 Of great unkindness and of usage hard,
 Of Cynthia the lady of the sea,
 Which from her presence, faultless, him debarr'd :
 And ever and anon with sngults rise,
 He cried out to make his under-song,
 Ah my love's queen, and goddess of my life !
 Who shall me pity, when thou dost me wrong ?*

BUT it immediately appears to have been soon blown over by some pathological address of Raleigh's to the queen, whereby he was, at this time, restored to her favour, as we may fully conclude from these words :

————— *Right well he sure did 'plain,
 That could great Cynthia's fore displeasure break,
 And move to take him to her grace again.*

AND this is confirm'd a little further, where, through Raleigh's affection for his welfare, and his regret to behold so rare a genius banish'd to a desert, and buried in such a state of obscurity, he persuades Spenser to go along with him into England, and proffers to introduce him to the queen. The poet, knowing his interest, embraced his offer. Then having given a description of the sea, with Raleigh's great ship, suitable to the simplicity of the character he as-fumes; and having represented Raleigh's description of the flocks and herds of that Royal Shepherdes, which were kept upon those watry hills, under the charge of Triton and Proteus, he makes him further say:

*And I among the rest, of many least,
Have in the ocean charge to me assign'd;
Where I will live or die at her behest,
And serve and honour her with faithful mind.*

Brings him into England. He then proceeds to the progress of their voyage, how they passed by the Isle of Lundy, and landed at St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall; so took their journey to the court, where the poet having expatiated on the dazzling presence of the queen, agreeable to the admiration of a spectator, in his pastoral character, we have this further acknowledgment.

Introduces him to the queen's favour.

*The shepherd of the ocean, quoth he,
Unto the goddess' grace me first enhanc'd:
And to my oaten pipe inclin'd her ear,
That she thenceforth therein 'gan take delight,
And it desir'd, at timely hours to bear;
All were my notes but rude and roughly dight.*

THIS honour the poet further magnifies, as the more wond'rous condescension in her majesty, in that she had so many more learned shepherds about her to glorify her name. Here he takes an opportunity to give a character of the several poets and wits then shining in her court: among the rest,

*And there that shepherd of the ocean is,
That spends his wit in love's consuming smart:
Full sweetly temper'd is that muse of his,
That can impierce a prince's mighty heart.*

Encourages the publication of the Fairy Queen.

As to Raleigh's poetical talents, we shall hear more of them very speedily. In this place, we must pursue his farther design of bringing Spenser over into England, which was to make him oblige the publick with what he had hitherto finish'd of his capital work, call'd the Fairy Queen. For, tho' Spenser had begun this grand poem through the encouragement of Sir Philip Sidney, before he went over into Ireland; yet it was there he seems to have writ most of what we have in print; and now, by the encouragement of Sir Walter Raleigh, that he was brought to publish the three first books which he had compleated thereof: 'tis certain he took his advice in the publication of them, and particularly in drawing up a plan to explain or discover the general intention and meaning of that allegorical poem. This he directed to his said patron, The right noble and valorous Sir Walter Raleigh, &c. in a letter dated the 23d of January this year 1589; concluding with "An humble request for the continuance of his honourable favours, and wishes for the eternal establishment of his happiness." This letter is printed at the end of the said first three books of that poem, which were published at London the ensuing year. Among the commendatory verses thereto also subjoined, the first two copies are both said to be written by Sir Walter Raleigh, and not without great probability, being subscribed with the initial letters of his name. The first of these copies, written in alternate verse, is highly poetical; for our author, correspondent with the visionary manner of his author, fancying himself in the temple of the vestal virgins, where his curiosity led him to the tomb of Laura, which was guarded by Love and Virtue, he was suddenly attracted from thence, by the appearance of the Fairy Queen, at whose approach the Soul of Petrarch wept; seeing those graces desert that mistress of his, to attend upon this royal lady, and oblivion supply their place. The compliment is surely fine, and perhaps the more judiciously express'd, in not being bounded more periodically than it is, according to the doctrine of our modern criticks in the structure of versification; for being the recital of one solemn and surprising thought, it may engage our attention more closely to the end of the two or three quadrains it is compris'd in, than if the author had affected to divide or bound the sense with a full period at the end of every four lines. But every reader may easily judge for himself, the poem being in most editions of Spenser, and therefore needs not here be recited. His other verses upon this poet are compos'd in a measure more obsolete to the manner of our age; but what what the queen her self imitated, in some poetry still to be seen of her writing, being in lines of six and seven feet long ; and it is no more to be objected, that an author did not in this particular apparel his mind to the mode of all ages, than his body. It may be sufficient therefore to observe, there is a distinguish'd conduct also in this performance ; for the induction is writ with great modesty, in regard to himself.

*The praise of meaner wits, this work like profit brings ;
As doth the cuckow's song, delight, when Philomela sings.*

And, having advertised the poet that his portraits are to be judg'd of or improv'd by the originals of those virtues whereof he has compos'd his fictitious queen, he very dexterously transfers or appropriates them to the real one then reigning : so concludes with a compliment to him ; which tho' of a very transcendent and absolute nature, yet in regard to the little good English poetry then in being, and the great fame of that poet still surviving among us, is still thought not more expressive of Sir Walter Ralegh's affection, than his judgment :

*Of me no lines are lov'd, nor letters are of price,
Of all that speak the English tongue, but those of thy device.*

WE further observe among the copies of verses inscrib'd by Spenser himself, at the end of his said Fairy Queen, to the several ministers of state and noblemen in queen Elizabeth's court, one to the noble and valorous Sir Walter Ralegh, &c. as he again styles him : and this, because it not only informs us what a favourite Ralegh was at this time with the queen ; but also gives us occasion to dilate upon his own poetical productions a little more copiously than opportunity has before offer'd, I must here entirely repeat.

*To thee that are the summer's nightingale,
Thy sovereign goddesses most dear delight,
Why do I send this rustick madrigal,
That may thy tuneful ear unseason quite ?
Thou only fit this argument to write ;
In whose high thoughts pleasure hath built her bowre,
And dainty love learn'd sweetly to indite :
My Rhimes I know unsav'ry are and sowre,
To taste the streams, which, like a golden showre,
Flow from thy fruitful head, of thy love's praise,
Fitter perhaps to thunder martial stowre,
When so thee list thy lofty muse to raise :
Yet till that thou thy poem wilt make known,
Let thy fair CYNTHIA's praises be thus rudely shown.*

HENCE we learn Sir Walter Ralegh wrote a poem, call'd CYNTHIA ; that it was in praise of the queen, and that it was not now publish'd. Spenser, in his letter to Ralegh above-cited, also mentions again something of this poem, where he says, “ In that Fairy Queen, I mean “ glory in my general intention ; but in my particular, I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our sovereign the queen, and her kingdom, in Fairy-land. And yet in some “ places else, I do otherwise shadow her. For considering she beareth two persons ; the one,
“ of a most royal queen or empress ; the other, of a most virtuous and beautiful lady ; this latter part, in some places, I do express in Belphebe ; fashioning her name according to your own “ excellent conceit of CYNTHIA ; Phoebe and Cynthia being both names of Diana.” This is all I remember to have met with of that poem.

BUT this very year that Ralegh was in Ireland, there was a book publish'd by a learned and ingenious gentleman ; in which others of Ralegh's poems, and perhaps that before mention'd, are quoted with great commendation ;<sup>a</sup> as if these few little pieces had before

Eminent for his own poetry.

<sup>a</sup> This treatise, now very scarce, is call'd The Art of English Poetry ; contriv'd into three books : the first of poets and poetry ; the second of proportion ; the third of ornament. London, 4to. 1589. I never saw but one of them, and this is in the curious library of that worthy owner James Hest Esq; of the Middle Temple. There is a wooden print of the queen before it ; and, tho' dedicated to the lord Buckley, the work is address'd directly to the queen. Therefore that passage in the first book, cap. 26. where the author is so luxuriant upon the Epithalamies, or poetical manner of celebrating marriages ; and that in the third book, cap. 23. where he makes the Imperial ambassador, a Bohemian born, so bluntly express in the French tongue what a gallant horse woman the empress was, will, among some others, be allow'd very remarkable, in a book so publicly and so particularly tender'd to the service of our virgin-queen.

before this time render'd him eminent, and advanc'd his name among the prime wits or leading poets of the age; not that we are sure they were now in common print, or vulgarly known to be his; for the said author, speaking of the most considerable writers in English poetry, says; "In her majesty's time sprung up another company of courtly poets, who "have writ excellently well, if their doings could be found out and made publick with the "rest; of which number is Edward earl of Oxford, Thomas lord Buckhurst, when young, "Henry lord Paget, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Walter Raleigh, and many others; some of whom "he further names."<sup>a</sup> Then proceeding to give his judgment in short characters of them; and having distinguish'd the earl of Oxford for Comedy, Buckhurst for Tragedy, Sir Philip Sidney, and the other gentleman who wrote the late Shepherd's Calender (meaning Spenser) for Eclogue and Pastoral, he adds; "For Ditty and amorous Ode, I find Sir Walter Raleigh's vein most lofty, insolent, and passionate."<sup>b</sup> But it is in the chapter of Sententious or Rhetorical Figures, that this critic illustrates his observations, by some examples out of Sir Walter Raleigh's poems; which, because rare to be met with, and not prolix, nor violating the privileges of particular and personal narrative, I shall here rehearse; the rather, because these fragments may both give further light into the genius, as well as history perhaps of their author, and help the enquiries of such readers, as are curious in comparing the monuments of ancient and modern wit, to recover and revive the entire pieces from whence they are extracted. That critic therefore, where he is speaking of some elegant tautologies in poetry, and particularly the excellences of the Anaphora, or figure of Report, as he translates it, gives us the following example, written by Sir Walter Raleigh; whether in his Cynthia, I cannot yet tell; but, to his greatest mistress, in most excellent verses, says that author.

*In vain, my eyes, in vain you waste your tears ;
In vain my sighs, the smokes of my despairs :
In vain you search the earth and heav'ns above ;
In vain you seek, for fortune keeps my love.<sup>c</sup>*

Further speaking of the Epizeuxis, which he Englisches the Underlay or Cuckow-Spell, another sort of repetition, when in one verse we iterate one word without intermission, he brings, as an example, that of Sir Walter Raleigh; very sweet, says he.

*With wisdom's eyes, had but blind fortune seen ,
Then had my love, my love for ever been.<sup>d</sup>*

And in another place, to distinguish that form of repetition, called Ploche, or the Doubler, a speedy iteration of one word, but with some little intermission, he exemplifies the two closing verses of a most excellent ditty, as he calls it, written by Sir Walter Raleigh. These two closing verses confirm the genuineness of those which precede them in a transcript of this very ditty I once saw in a nobleman's library, from the copy of a celebrated lady,<sup>e</sup> who probably had

But for the rest, it contains many pretty observations, examples, characters and fragments of poetry for those times, now no-where else to be met with; which if some of our modern critics had read, they would have been better acquainted than they were, with certain antiquities in the English meter, whereof they have erroneously spoken. The author was educated at Oxford; born about the year 1530, or not long after; and wrote several other books, whereof he gives us the titles himself. So that if his name was Puttenham, one of the queen's gentlemen-pensioners, as Anthony Wood thinks, he was entitled to a more distinct remembrance in his book of Oxford writers. That he was a courtier, is visible; also had been a traveller, and seen the courts of foreign princes; wherefore his illustrations, both historical and political, are drawn so familiarly from thence, that he may be call'd the court-critic of that reign.

<sup>b</sup> Ib. p. 51. Some modern authors, and among them Edward Philips, as I remember, in his Theatrum Poetarum, 12mo. 1675, but I am sure A. Wood. vol. i. col. 436, and others from him, have, in the quotation of this character, changed that middle epithet for the word condolent; perhaps through an unnecessary tenderness; every word of that character being spoken, and to be understood, in a sense of praise.

found in any of the printed editions I have seen of his poems: but I have had an old MS. collection, in which one poem is directed to the lady Isabella Thynne cutting trees in paper; which poem is printed among Mr. Waller's, but her name left out. In the print also we have only a fragment; but my copy had it entire. For the poem which follows it, in Mr. Waller's printed collection, is a compliment to the same lady for restoring him this piece, because he desired to print it, tho' the last thought was torn off and lost; which, to his regret, he never could recollect; so was obliged to print it imperfectly, in his own apprehensions at least, tho' all the world besides have looked upon what is printed of it as a perfect masterpiece, even of that great hand: and for our consolation it may be observ'd, if he had not lost this conclusion, we should have lost that fine poem, which was the consequence of it. The sentiment this MS. could have restored him, consisted, as I think, of six lines, but that I cannot repeat them all; yet presume, upon the favour which is due to the fair sex, that it will not be thought an unwelcome digression here to preserve what I can of them, and as well as I can, lest they should be lost again, by not having an opportunity to remember them elsewhere.

So far the teller goes beyond the pen*

it out of the family. 'Tis there entitled, The Excuse, written by Sir Walter Raleigh, in his younger years. And, because by the foregoing parts of this admir'd ditty the conclusion will be best understood, I shall here repeat the whole from the aforefaid transcript; not doubting but the modern readers will judge of it by its contemporary writings; or if by their own, after due consideration, how they may be judg'd of near a hundred and fifty years hence; but more especially, that the readers may see with what artful simplicity the author could reconcile himself to his passion, whether real or feign'd, when he found, upon a strict examination, he had not been indirectly betray'd to it.

*Calling to mind my eyes went long about,
To cause my heart for to forsake my breast;
All in a rage, I sought to pull them out;
As who had been such traitors to my rest:
What could they say to win again my grace?
Forsooth, that they had seen my mistress' face.*

*Another time, my heart I call'd to mind;
Thinking that he this woe on me had brought;
Because that he, to love, his force resign'd,
When of such wars my fancy never thought:
What cou'd he say when I wou'd him have slain?
That he was hers--- and had forgone my chain.*

*At last, when I perceiv'd both eyes and heart
Excuse themselves, as guiltless of my ill;
I found my self the cause of all my smart,
And told my self, that I my self would kill:
Yet when I saw my self to you was true;
I lov'd my self, because my self lov'd you.*

This poem, I have been told, is printed under Sir Walter Raleigh's name, in a modern collection,<sup>a</sup> not much to be suspected of having had it from any ancient manuscript, therefore probably from some old copy in print, which I have not yet met with. There is one old collection I never saw, printed about the time we are now upon, with several of Sir Philip Sidney's sonnets in it, and therefore I think under his name;<sup>b</sup> which possibly may contain some also of Sir Walter Raleigh's. But in that modern collection there is also printed, not over-correctly it seems, another poem of his: this I have likewise seen in manuscript, where it is call'd the Silent Lover; and have heard several lines in it applauded, especially the beginning. But the part, which would be most agreeable in this place to an historical reader, is that from which he might fancy he could make some further guesses at the object of Raleigh's address; tho' after all it may be no other than the common object of all poets: however, the lines are these:

*But seeing that I sue to serve
A saint of such perfection,
As all desire, and none deserve
A place in her affection;
I rather chuse to want relief,
Than venture the revealing;
Where glory recommends the grief,
Despair disdains the healing.*

And a little further, very persuasively:

*Silence in love betrays more woe
Than words, tho' never so witty;
A beggar that is dumb, you know,
May challenge double pity.*

In short, he has said such handsome things of silence, that it were a pity any words even in its commendation, but his own, should break it. But it will perhaps hereafter be thought he could break it himself with as much success, as now he seems to have commanded the keeping it. All that I have seen more of his juvenile compositions in this kind, is a pastoral sonnet, which old Mr. Isaac Walton reciting, tells us was written by Sir Walter Raleigh, in his younger years,<sup>a</sup> in answer to another, famous also in those days, composed by Christopher Marlow; but as both these sonnets are involv'd in a collection which the bookellers or publishers have called Shakespeare's poems, printed between twenty and thirty years after his death,<sup>b</sup> in which I think several pieces are known to have been written by other poets; the reader is left at liberty to judge whether the authority of a writer, who subscribes his name thereto, one, of Walton's noted sincerity, and advantages for intelligence by his acquaintance among the men of literature in those times; or that of an anonymous publication in the circumstances aforesaid, is to be preferr'd; without urging the improbability that Shakespeare should quote a stanza, from that ascrib'd to Marlow, afterwards in one of his own plays, if he had been the author of that sonnet himself.<sup>c</sup>

THERE is another poet besides Spenser, who writ something of Raleigh relating to these times, tho' near twenty years after them; and as on a different subject, so with a different disposition towards him. This poet was Sir John Harrington, the translator of Orlando Furioso; but that which he is here mention'd for, is a little book in prose, yet not clear of poetry,<sup>d</sup> tho' it was intended for a piece of church-history, and as a supply to Dr. Francis Godwin's Catalogue of Bishops. This, at the time that Raleigh was under royal displeasure in the next reign, and in confinement; but growing into favour with the hopeful prince of Wales, Sir John Harrington, then a courtier, presented to that prince: 'tis full of little jests and tales against the married clergy, and against some of the laity who had any controversies with them, the better to insinuate with that young prince, and engage his attention; otherwise the author would doubtless have written it with a gravity suitable to the subject; but he tells the prince, "he took " some kind of pleasure with the pains of writing it, supposing (says he) I was all the while " telling a story as it were in your highness's presence and hearing."<sup>e</sup> Among the stories he tells, there is one concerning Dr. Thomas Godwin, bishop of Bath and Wells, and Sir Walter Raleigh, it seems;<sup>f</sup> the relation of which, because that bishop died about the latter end of 1590, we shall not longer defer. This bishop, he tells us, came to that see, among his other good qualities, unproveable for Simony, and in the queen's good opinion: if he had held on as clear as he enter'd, I should have highly extoll'd him, says our author; but, continues he, see his misfortune, which first lost him the queen's favour, and after forced him to another mischief. For being aged, diseased, and lame of the gout, he married, as some thought, for opinion of wealth, says he, a London widow, his second wife at least: when a chief favourite of that time (whom he had named before in this kind, and therefore thought by some,<sup>g</sup> as perhaps it might be, Sir Walter Raleigh) had labour'd to get the manor of Banwell from this bishoprick; but disdain the repulse, and hearing of this intempestive marriage, he took advantage thereof, caus'd it to be told the queen (knowing how much she disliked such matches) and instantly pursued the bishop with letters and mandates for the manor of Banwell for a hundred years. The good bishop, says he, not expecting such a sudden tempest, was greatly perplex'd; yet a while he held out, and endured many sharp messages from the queen; of which my self, says he, carried one, deliver'd to me by my lord of Leicester, who seem'd to favour the bishop, and dislike the knight for molesting him; but they were soon agreed, says he, like Pilot and Herod to condemn Christ. And further tells us, never was harmless man so traduced to his sovereign; as that he had married a girl; had convey'd half the bishoprick to her; and, because he had the gout, that he could not stand to his marriage.—The conclusion to the premisses, he tells us, was, that to pacify his persecutors, and to save Banwell, he was fain to part with Wilcomb for ninety-nine years; and so purchased his peace. We may hence observe this matter was in agitation before Leicester's death, which was two years before this time; but, as the bishop seems to have linger'd before he clos'd, it might be near this time before it was brought to a perfect conclusion. And, as he did not hold on so clear as he enter'd, it might be with reference to the Simony before-mention'd; the rather, because a bishop who would not scruple at his years to marry for money, might be reasonably thought not impregnable, through the same motive, against a divorcement from his bishoprick: which way soever it was, the queen saw it not unreasonable, but espoused the alienation; so that it was her gift. And the bishop's own son, Dr. Francis Godwin, when he was a bishop also, and reviving his Catalogue of Bishops, in the next reign, before Raleigh was out of prison, makes no complaint against him in the account of his father's life; tho' he might safely, if he could justly, have done it, and Raleigh had been possess'd of that for which this author's father had not, according to the custom of those times, received satisfaction.<sup>a</sup> On the contrary, with much modesty, rather laments that his father should take upon him the duties of ecclesiastical government, when his infirmities had render'd him unable to discharge them.<sup>b</sup>

Wilcombe.

If this affair did any ways displease the hierarchy, there was another occurrence fell out about this time, in which Raleigh, by shewing a generous and charitable instance of his power and interest, might give some further umbrage for its displeasure. It was in the case of Mr. John Udall, minister of the gospel, a good scholar, and a man of good parts; but very zealous for the reformation of the church, even under the episcopal government; for which he was reckon'd among the Nonconformists, or rather Puritans of those times. He had been bred at Cambridge; was seven years minister of Kingston upon Thames; and, through the favour of the earl of Huntington, about a twelvemonth at Newcastle upon Tyne. Here he was silenc'd, sent for to London by letters from the lord-chamberlain Hunsdon, in the name of the council,<sup>c</sup> and examin'd about a book he had newly published against the clergy.<sup>d</sup> But because, contrary to the laws, he would not betray himself, says my author, he was committed close prisoner to the Gatehouse; debarr'd of all communication with his family or others; thence convey'd to Croydon in July this present year 1590; brought to the bar in fetters, and indicted for publishing a libel against the queen. No evidence viva voce produc'd to attest it, but only depositions taken in the high commission-court, no court of record, and hearsay reports urg'd against him, his witnesses not being permitted to testify in his behalf, because the court said it was against the queen: the words of the statute being wrested, says my author, by baron Clark and serjeant Puckering, as if the treatise call'd, The Demonstration of Discipline, for which Udall was now indicted, because written against bishops who exercis'd their government under the queen, was therefore consequently written against her royal person. So the said judges directed the jury to find Udall author of the book without legal proof, and to leave the felony to them. The jury did as they were taught, being told it should be no further danger to the author, but tend to his good; of which verdict they afterwards repented. Then he was kept half a year uncondemn'd in durance; and at the assizes in February following at Southwark, not relinquishing his tenets, he had the sentence of death pronounc'd against him by Puckering.<sup>e</sup> But it seems before Udall receiv'd this sentence, he had procur'd a friend to solicit Sir Walter Raleigh, that the violent and aggravated constructions which had been made of his doctrine and principles, might not be his utter destruction, till a more unprejudic'd judgment was made of them; and immediately after the sentence was pronounc'd, the sheriff brought him a reprieve from the queen. Then Dr. Bond, one of her chaplains, came to him in prison with a form of submission for him to subscribe. After two days conference, they agreed upon another. But, says Udall, "at the same time that Dr. Bond was with me, I receiv'd a letter from a friend of mine that did solicit Sir Walter Raleigh for me."<sup>f</sup> This letter he then exhibits, and thereby it appears Raleigh had advis'd or encouraged Udall to explain himself to him concerning those imputations which had been infused into her majesty, which accused him with maintaining, the church of England and its sacraments were no church and no sacraments; that its laws and her government were against the word of God; that all

The horrible treason in this book it seems (which was inserted in the indictment) lay in these words to the bishops: "Who can, without blushing, deny you to be the cause of all ungodliness, seeing your government is that which giveth leave to a man to be any thing saving a sound christian: for certainly it is more free in these days, to be a Papist, an Anabaptist, of the Family of

This pamphlet is Udall's own account of the whole prosecution against him; whether printed in the queen's time, I cannot tell; but the same account, I think, that is reprinted in the State-Trials; tho' the title to this pamphlet is adapted to the time wherein it was now printed; and the preface is a clear abstract of the whole.

ecclesiastical matters ought to be governed by a presbytery; and that she ought to be subject to the censures thereof; for (says that correspondent) “If ye will write half a dozen lines to Sir Walter Raleigh concerning these opinions, that he may shew it to her majesty, he hopes to obtain your life. I know it is very easy for you to answer all those things, therefore do it with speed; and in your writing to Sir Walter take knowledge, that he hath sent you such word.” Hereupon Udall wrote a letter, which he also sets forth, directed to the right honourable Sir Walter Raleigh, Knt. lord-warden of the stannaries, wherein, after the remembrance of his duty and thanks for his great and honourable care over him and for his good, he most humbly beseeches him to be a means to appease her majesty’s displeasure for the accusations untruly suggested against him.

for Mr. Udall.

“For God is my witness (continues he) I have never had any earthly thing in so precious account as to honour her highness, and to draw her subjects to acknowledge with all thankfulness, the exceeding blessings that God bestoweth upon them by her majesty’s happy government; whereof I trust my adversaries will be witnesses when I am dead. I have sent unto your lordship (as in perplexity I could upon the sudden) what I hold upon certain points declared unto me, as from your lordship, praying, that it would please you to make known the truth thereof unto her highness: and if neither my submission heretofore delivered, nor these things now set down, will be accepted to draw her highness of her gracious compassion to pardon me, that yet it would please her majesty, that the land may not be charged with my blood, to change my punishment from death to banishment. Thus trusting your lordship will vouchsafe me this favour, and that it will please her majesty thereupon graciously to consider me, I humbly take my leave from the White Lyon, Feb. 22. 1590.”<sup>a</sup> Herewith he sent the tenets he maintained, or articles of his persuasion, which are to be seen immediately following the said letter in his own narrative, and elsewhere.<sup>b</sup> After this he remain’d, according to his own expression, without great hope of liberty, yet without fear of further extremity.<sup>c</sup> Whence it may be rightly observed by some historians, that Sir Walter Raleigh, through his generous intercession, did procure Udall’s reprieve, or save him from execution. Till a few months after, being further pester’d with stricter forms of submission, by Dr. Andrews, he was forced to make further applications, not only by the earl of Essex, but Sir Walter Raleigh again, and dean Nowell, against the menaces of the approaching assizes at Kingston.<sup>d</sup> About the same time the king of Scots also wrote a letter to the queen in behalf of the said Mr. Udall, and other learned nonconformists.<sup>e</sup> But this wrought only so far, when Udall was brought to Kingston, that he was immediately returned to prison before the first day of the trials, and thereupon the unlucky disturbance of Hacket the enthusiast ensuing, Udall was discouraged from making further solicitation till the lord-chancellor Hatton died.<sup>f</sup> The Easter after which, he sued for liberty to go to church, which was denied him, being a condemn’d man: but, by the lord-treasurer’s means, getting a copy of the indictment, and a pardon fram’d according to it, he was refer’d therewith to archbishop Whitgift; “Unto whom (says he) I both sent divers petitions, and dutiful letters; and also got many of my friends, both honourable persons and others, to sue to him; yet could not his good-will be gotten.”<sup>g</sup> And when the Turkey merchants apply’d to his Grace, that Udall might go over to Guinea, he would not consent to that, unless they would be bound he should not return till he had her majesty’s licence; but to this Udall would not consent. And tho’ Sir John Puckering, now lord-keeper,

<sup>a</sup> We may observe, that Udall, in this letter, here quoted from his said narrative, addresses Sir Walter Raleigh (as lord-warden) by the title of his Lordship; but, as Mr. Styke copies it, in his life of Whitgift, fol. 376, that word is changed for his Honour, as if this author, or those he takes this part of his materials from, had copied the letter out of Udall’s narrative, and helped him (in their thoughts) to a title more proper for Sir Walter Raleigh. If Mr. Styke had seen this pamphlet, it will make something against the character of his sincerity, in advancing so much his archbishop’s christian mildness; see his life, fol. 344. and representing him to have been most active in procuring Udall’s pardon, by his effectual intercessions with the queen; as if the queen only was inexorable at Udall’s endeavour to reform her bishops; which is partially throwing all the cruelty Udall suffer’d upon her, when it will plainly appear in the sequel of this pamphlet, that Whitgift was the chief author of it; and yet, if Mr. Styke had seen this letter to Sir Walter Raleigh in Udall’s pamphlet, ’tis to be thought, he would have corrected the date in his own copy by it, which is a whole year too late; not that he is ever correct in other dates, even of the story which is incommodiously told, and confused with repetition, for, in two places of the archbishop’s life, he tells us, Udall died 1591, fol. 244. and 1592, fol. 245. and that he died, which is most probable, in 1592; and a little further quotes a letter of Udall’s to the lord-treasurer, dated in 1591, wherein he tells his lordship, he had been in durance above three years.

<sup>e</sup> Herein his majesty tells the queen, “That hearing of the apprehension of Mr. Udall, Mr. Cartwright, and certain other learned ministers of the evangel, within your realm (says he) of whose good erudition and fruitful travels in the church, we hear a very credible commendation, howsoever their diversity from the bishops, and others of your clergy, in matters touching them in conference, hath been a mean, by their dilation, to work them your misliking; at this present, we cannot (weighing the duty we owe to such as are afflicted for their conscience in that profession) but by our most effectual and earnest letter, interpose our hands to any harder usage of them for that cause. So requesting her earnestly to let them be released out of their present thraldom, he concludes, from London the 12 of June, 1591. See the letter at length in the said pamphlet, p. 40.

was at last moved (who indeed had much reason to be so) to deal with the archbishop, so that both promised to obtain Udall's pardon of her majesty, and liberty for the said voyage; yet Udall never enjoyed one or the other, for he died in prison before they were fully confirmed.<sup>b</sup>

HERE we may give another instance of Raleigh's friendly and generous exercise of his power and interest, for an old officer in the army, since there is no date to it, that confines us to any particular year; and, if we may guess at the success of his request by the zeal of it, we shall not doubt, but it effectually obliged his petitioner with the fruits thereof. This officer had a sum of money long owing him, it seems, from the treasury, and, knowing how well Raleigh was acquainted with the justice of the debt, no less than what influence his applications would be of for procuring it, prevail'd on him to write to the lord-treasurer's secretary, who was afterwards knighted, and well known by the name of Sir Michael Hicks, that he might obtain his lordship's order for the payment of the money. These are the words of his letter:

"I am most earnestly to intreat you for this gentleman, captain Spring; that partly for love, And for cap-
 "partly for honest consideration, you will further him with my lord-treasurer for a debt of tain Spring.
 "three hundred pounds, which her majesty owes him. It hath been long due; and he has "got good warrant for it: besides, he has served her majesty very long, and hath received "many wounds in her service. These reasons delivered by a man of your utterance, and "having his good angel at your elbow to instruct you, I doubt not, but it will take good and
 "speedy effect. (Concluding) I never wrote unto you for any man, or in any matter, "wherein you shall more bind me unto you, than for this bearer: and so not doubting of "your assured friendliness, I leave you to God; and remain your most assured loving friend."

In a postscript he says, "Always remember you must deal conscionably for my sake, and I will requite you."<sup>c</sup> Examples of this kind shew men worthy of the power they enjoy, and shine brighter in their characters than many actions of a more publick and magnificent nature; power being so often corrupted with pride and other passions, as frequently render the possessors of it mischievous, rather than beneficial to their fellow-creatures. But Raleigh, in these and many other instances, was so far from misusing, that, above the narrow apprehensions of repulse, or laying himself under obligations, he appears to have exerted it in the most strenuous and generous manner, either for preventing or relieving the distress of others, which moved the greater compassion when his own misfortunes brought him to need, and yet to fail of the like liberal and successful mediation for himself. The truth is, Raleigh was so famous in these days, for such-like good offices, that the queen seems to have distinguished him by a title more honourable, in the proper sense it is to be here taken, than any other she conferred upon him: for one day, having told her he had a favour to beg of her, When, Sir Walter, said she, will you cease to be a beggar? To which he answered, When your gracious majesty ceases to be a benefactor.<sup>d</sup> With great justice therefore seems, a certain noted author of these times, to have adapted his work to a patron, when he dedicated a discourse upon Friendship, which he published not long before this time, to Sir Walter Raleigh.<sup>e</sup>

BUT friendship made such a rare and lasting impression on him, that it may be said to have extended beyond the life of the object; and he well deserves to be remembered in his grave, who could leave us such noble patterns in memory of the dead. But this place requires only our notice of the memorial he wrote, to clear from some Spanish aspersions, the fame and conduct of the valiant and renowned Sir Richard Grenvill, in that bloody expedition, where he made such a glorious, tho' untimely end. This brave commander was vice-admiral in the lord Thomas Howard's expedition, to intercept the Spanish plate-fleet at the isles of Azores in its return from America. The English squadron consisted of six of the queen's ships, six victuallers of London, with two or three pinnaces. They set out early in the spring 1591, and waited six months at Flores, one of those islands, in expectation of the said fleet. As there was, besides the English Ships before number'd, one also of Sir Walter's in this expedition, named Bark Raleigh, commanded by captain Thynne; and as he employ'd some time in the latter end of this year to describe that memorable engagement they had with the Spaniards; the brief abstract I shall give thereof from his own words, cannot be arraign'd of prolixity, nor perhaps of digression; since, besides his gratitude for the past services of his heroic kinsman, it so well displays his sentiments at this time of the religious hypocrisies and cruelties of their common enemy. The king of Spain therefore, having had intelligence of their waiting thus for his Indian fleet, sent an Armada to the Azores of fifty-three sail to convoy it home, under the command of Don Alphonso Bagan. This fleet was just in sight of the English by then they had any warning of it; and they were so unprepar'd for its reception, that many of their crew were on shore, providing ballast, water, and other necessaries; and those who were on board, were half of them, through sickness, unfit for service. The Spaniards were now so near at hand, that the English had scarce time to weigh anchor; and Grenvill, in the Revenge, was the last upon the place, being desirous of receiving all his crew aboard from the island, whereof he had no less than ninety who were sick and diseased. So that, unable to recover the wind, and having but one hundred sound men, he was persuaded to cut his main-sail, cast about, and trust to the sailing of the ship; for the squadron of Seville was on his weather-bow: but he, through the greatness of his spirit, utterly refused to turn from the enemy; protesting he would rather die than be guilty of such dishonour to himself, his country, and her majesty's ship; assuring his company he would pass through the two squadrons in spite of them, and force those of Seville to give him way; which he perform'd upon divers of the foremost, who, as the mariners term it, sprung their loof, and fell under the lee of the Revenge: but while he had regard to those who were nearest, the huge San Philip, being in the wind of him, and approaching, becalm'd his sails in such manner, that the ship could neither make way, nor feel the helm; so large and high charged was the Spanish galleon, being of fifteen hundred ton, carrying three tire, of eleven pieces in each on a side, and discharging eight fore-right from her chase, besides those of her stern-ports. After the Revenge was thus entangled with this Philip, four others loosing up also, boarded her, two on the larboard, and two on the starboard. The fight thus beginning at three a-clock in the afternoon, on the last of August the year aforesaid, continued very terrible all that evening. But San Philip having received the lower tire of the Revenge, charged with cross-bar shot, shifted with all expedition, utterly mistaking her first greeting. Some said she founder'd hereupon; but this is uncertain. The Spanish ships were fill'd with soldiers; some having two hundred, besides mariners; some five, others eight hundred men: in the English ship there were only mariners, with the commanders servants, and some gentlemen-volunteers. After many exchanges of great and small shot, the Spaniards many times attempted to board the Revenge, but were as often beaten back into their own ships, or into the sea; and when a London victualler, who was under the lee of the Revenge, offer'd to undertake any service for her assistance, Grenvill bid him "Save himself, and leave him to his fortune." The fight thus continuing while the day lasted, and some hours of the night, many of the English were slain; some of the Spanish ships sunk; and in many others there was great slaughter: Grenvill, tho' wounded in the beginning of the close fight, was never so disabled as to forsake the upper deck for eight hours together; and then being shot into the body with a musket, as the wound was dressing, he was again shot into the head, and his surgeon at the same time wounded to death. Still the fight continued, and as fast as the Spaniards were beaten off by the Revenge, others came in their places; so that by morning she had sustained, for fifteen hours together, the vollies, boardings, and entries of fifteen several ships of war, and repulsed them all; besides the rest which batter'd her loose and at a distance. But with the light, increas'd the discovery of her dismal condition; and the more irksome was the one, in that it would not let her conceal the other from her surrounding enemies.<sup>a</sup> Now was to be seen nothing of a general, to commit himself and his charge to assured destruction, without hope or any likelihood of prevailing thereby, to diminish the strength of her majesty's navy, and enrich the pride and glory of the enemy. The Forefight of the queen's (continues he) commanded by Mr. Thomas Vaux, performed a very great fight, and stay'd two hours as near the Revenge as the weather would permit, not forsaking the fight till he was likely to be encompass'd by the squadrons, and with great difficulty clear'd himself. The rest gave divers vollies of shot, and enter'd as far as the place permitted, and their own necessities, to keep the weather-gage of the enemy, until they were parted by night." Thus in Sir Walter Raleigh's said of report this fight.

but the naked hull of a ship, and that almost a skeleton, having received eight hundred shot of great artillery, and some under water; her deck cover'd with the limbs and carcasses of forty valiant men, the rest all wounded, and weltering in, or cover'd with their own blood; her masts all beaten over-board, all her tackle cut asunder, her upper works razed, and all in effect levell'd with the water; incapable of any further management or motion, but what the billows gave her. Grenvill, now finding their distress irreparable, commanded the ship to be sunk, that the Spaniards might not carry a splinter home as a trophy of their dear-bought victory; dear-bought indeed! the admiral of the Spanish hulks, and another great galleon, called the Ascension of Seville, being both sunk by the side of the Revenge; another also in the road of St. Michael; and a fourth run herself a-ground to save her company. There were besides slain and drown'd in this fight two eminent Spanish commanders, and near a thousand of their men, as one of their own officers, who was sever'd from the fight by the ensuing storm, and taken by a London vessel, confess'd. In that storm, as well the whole Indian fleet, which had now join'd them, as the rest of the Armada, were so dispers'd and damag'd, that fourteen sail were cast away upon the Isle of St. Michael. On the rest of the islands they also lost fifteen or sixteen more of their ships of war; and of their Indian fleet, which was a hundred and odd sail, there were also above seventy consum'd and taken by our ships of London; besides a very rich one which set her self on fire, and five others taken by Mr. Wats's ships. Three thousand carcasses were found two or three days after on the Isle of Tercera; and, by the Spaniards own confession, no less than ten thousand of their countrymen were lost in this expedition.<sup>a</sup> But to return: Sir Richard exhorted the remainder of his company to trust in God's mercy, and to none else; and, as they had thus long and resolutely repulsed so many enemies, that they would not now lessen the honour of their country, by any overtures to lengthen for a few hours or days their own lives. Several join'd in opinion with him; but the majority prevail'd, who urg'd, the Spaniard would be as ready to entertain a composition, as they to offer it; and that there were divers valiant men yet living, who might do their prince acceptable service, and revenge this action upon the enemy; that the ship could be of no use either to one or the other, for upon the first working of the sea she must needs sink, being so crush'd, riv'd, and leaky, having six foot water in the hold, that she could never remove out of the place. Accordingly the Spanish general Don Alphonso Baçan did make very honourable concession; yielding that all their lives should be sav'd, the company sent into England, and the better sort only to pay a reasonable ransom, free from all gallies or imprisonment. Tho' it may be thought it was not difficult to dissuade men from death to life, the master-gunner would have slain himself when he found their resolution thus by reason over-borne; but that he was by force with-held. Then the general sent many boats aboard the Revenge, and divers of the English suspecting Sir Richard's desperate disposition to blow up or sink the ship, stole away to the Spaniards. But the general prevail'd upon him to remove out of the Revenge, being very unsavoury, fill'd as it was, like a slaughter-house, with the bodies and blood of the dead and wounded. Sir Richard told them, they might do with his body what they pleas'd, for it was now of no use to him; and, as he was carried out of the ship, he swooned, but revived again, and desir'd the company to pray for him. The general used him with the utmost humanity, and left nothing unattempted for his recovery; highly respecting, or rather admiring, the wonderful and unconquerable resolution in so rare a spectacle of consummate and approv'd intrepidity, who could make such resistance for so long time, and such havock upon such an Armada, with a single ship and so few men. Sir Richard linger'd two or three days, and then died aboard the general, who greatly bewailed his loss;<sup>b</sup> but the Revenge, with two hundred Spaniards in her, being overtaken by the storms

<sup>a</sup> Linschoten, in the 99th chapter of his voyages to the East and West-Indies, says, that of the whole fleet and Armada, being 140 ships, there were but 32 or 33 arriv'd in Spain and Portugal; and those with such difficulty and dispersion, that not any two arriv'd together; all the rest were cast away upon the islands and overwhelm'd in the sea by that violent storm: so that for twenty days after it they did nothing but fish for dead men.

<sup>b</sup> The same Dutch author, tho' he mistakes in some particulars; as making this engagement to have happen'd a fortnight later, &c. yet agrees with Sir Walter Raleigh that Sir Richard made a wonderful opposition; for he mentions, "no less than seven or eight ships boarding the Revenge; that she resisted them at least twelve hours; that the Spaniards lost above 400 men in the fight; and that when Sir Richard was convey'd into the Spanish admiral's ship the St. Paul, all the captains were astonish'd at his stout and courageous heart, for he shew'd no sign of faintness, nor change of colour; but, feeling the hour of death approach, said in the Spanijsh tongue, Hoe die I

"Richard Grenvill, with a joyful and quiet mind, having ended my life like a true soldier, that has fought for his country, queen, religion, and honour, &c. He gives us further, as an instance of his bravery, that while he continued amongst the Spanish captains, and they were at dinner or supper with him, he would carouse three or four glasses of wine, and take the glasses between his teeth and crush them in pieces, and swallow them down; so that often the blood would run out of his mouth, without any other harm to him." Which I can believe without scruple, having seen an officer of the army in a frolic do the like, and swallow the glass he had drank in, all but the solid stem, or that part which is not mandible; but more cautiously than Sir Richard seems to have perform'd it, for he drew not a drop of blood from any part of his mouth. As for Grenvill's pedigree, it may be seen in the late collection of English baronets, 12mo. 1728; but the memorials that are attempted of him in H. Holland, Fuller, and Prince, are far short of his actions and defects.

aforesaid, was sunk with the others above-mention'd, at St. Michael's Island. In this manner did they honour the burial of that renown'd ship; and thus did she to the last make good her name upon them.

Thus have we gather'd from Sir Walter Raleigh what is here most material of this extraordinary action; but when he further observes the general's former promise was not perform'd, of setting the prisoners at liberty; so that they petition'd to be landed upon the islands, hoping to be thence transported into England: and also the endeavours that were made to corrupt their loyalty, by Morrice Fitz-John (son of old John of Desmond before-mention'd) who sent to the English from ship to ship, persuading them to serve the king of Spain, through the motives of trebling their pay, advancing their condition, and improving their faith, to the safety of their souls, he is moved to make some sharp and lively reflections upon these topicks; on the last whereof he expresses himself in this manner. "For matter of religion, it would re-

on the Spanish pretences of Religion.

"quire a particular volume to set down how irreligiously they cover their greedy and ambitious practices with that veil of piety; for, sure I am, there is no kingdom or commonwealth in all Europe, but if reform'd, they invade it for religion-sake: if it be, as they term, Catholick, they pretend title; as if the kings of Castile were the natural heirs of all the world; and so between both, no kingdom is unsought. Where they dare not with their own forces invade, they basely entertain the traitors and vagabonds of all nations; seeking by those and their renegade jesuits to win parts; and have by that means ruin'd many noble houses and others in this land, and have extinguish'd both their lives and families. What good, honour, or fortune, ever man yet by them atchiev'd, is yet unheard of, or unwritten. And if our English papists do but look into Portugal, against which they have no pretence of religion; how the nobility are put to death, imprison'd; their rich men made a prey, and all sorts of people captiv'd; they shall find, that the obedience even of the Turk is easy, and a liberty, in respect of the slavery and tyranny of Spain. What have they done in Sicily, Naples, Milan, and the Low-Countries? Who hath there been spared for religion at all? And it cometh to my remembrance of a certain burgher of Antwerp, whose house being enter'd by a company of Spanish soldiers when they first sack'd the city, he besought them to spare him and his goods, being a good catholick, and one of their own party. The Spaniards answer'd, They knew him to be of a good conscience for himself; but his money, plate, jewels, and goods, were all heretical; and therefore lawful prize. So they abused and tormented the foolish Fleming, who hoped that an Agnus Dei had been a sufficient target against all force of that holy and charitable nation. Neither have they at any time, as they protest, invaded the Indies or Peru, but rather to reduce the people to Christianity, than either for gold or empire; whereas in one only island, called Hispaniola, they have wasted three millions of the natural people, besides many millions else in other places of the Indies: a poor and harmless people, created of God, and might have been won to his knowledge, as many of them were, and almost as many as ever were persuaded thereunto. The story whereof is at large written by a bishop of their own nation, called Bartholomew de las Casas, and translated into English, and many other languages, entitled, The Spanish Cruelties. Who would therefore repose trust in such a nation of ravenous strangers; and especially in those Spaniards, who more greedily thirst after English blood, than after the lives of any other people in Europe? For the many overthrows and dishonours they have received at our hands, whose weakness we have discovered to the world, and whose forces at home, abroad, in Europe, in India, by sea and land, we have, even with handfuls of men and ships, overthrown and dishonour'd. Let not therefore any Englishman, of what religion soever, have other opinion of the Spaniard, but that those whom he seeketh to win in our nation, he esteemeth base and traiterous, unworthy persons or unconstant fools: and that he useth his pretence of religion for no other purpose, but to bewitch us from the obedience of our natural prince; thereby hoping in time to bring us to slavery and subjection. And then none shall be unto them so odious and disdain'd as the traitors themselves, who have sold their country to a stranger, and forsaken their faith and obedience, contrary to nature and religion; and even contrary to that human and general humour not only of Christians, but of heathen and irreligious nations, who have always sustain'd what labour soever, and imbraced even death it self for their country, prince, or commonwealth. To conclude: it hath ever to this day pleased God to prosper and defend her majesty, to break the purposes of malicious enemies, of forsworn traitors, and of unjust practices and invasions. She hath ever been honour'd of the worthiest kings; served by faithful subjects; and shall, by the favour of God, resist, repel, and confound all whatsoever attempts against her sacred person or kingdom. In the

“ mean time, let the Spaniards and traitors vaunt of their success; and we her true and obedient vassals, guided by the shining light of her virtues, shall always love her, serve her, and obey her to the end of our lives.”

RALEGH had no sooner done with his pen, but he took up arms against the Spaniards, intending to seek reparation of them for the losses aforesaid. He had formed an enterprise upon Panama, with a design also of meeting the Spanish plate-fleet; was at great expence in fitting out a maritime force for that purpose; and used his utmost interest and diligence to engage many worthy friends in the adventure. The scheme he laid down appear'd so feasible to her majesty, having provided no less than thirteen ships of his own and his associates, all well mann'd, and plentifully furnished with arms, provisions, and all other necessities, that she added to them two of her own men of war, named the Garland and Forefight; and gave him a commission, constituting him general of the fleet.<sup>a</sup>

General of an expedition to Panama.

The honour of lieutenant-general was given to Sir John Burgh, a gentleman altogether worthy of the command. And indeed all his comforts, officers, soldiers and sailors, were men of notable resolution; such as had given sufficient proof of their valour in divers services; and, to give them their right, says my author, so well qualified in courage, experience and discretion, that the greatest prince might repute himself happy to be served by the like. With these ships thus equipp'd, Raleigh departed in February, the year aforesaid, to the west of England, there to store himself with such further conveniences as he thought he should need; but the westerly winds blowing for a long time contrary to his course, bound him to keep harbour so many weeks, that the fittest season for his purpose was expir'd, and much of his provisions consum'd. The queen, understanding how unluckily he was detain'd, it being the sixth of May following, that is, in the year 1592, before Raleigh could put to sea, she sent Sir Martin Frobisher after him, who overtook him the very next day, with letters of revocation. But Raleigh finding his honour so far engag'd in the undertaking of this voyage, that, without proceeding, he saw no remedy either to salve his reputation, or satisfy his friends, who had contributed so largely to this adventure; and interpreting the queen's letters, as if her commands had been propounded in terms of latitude, either to advance or retire at his own discretion, would by no means consent to leave the fleet, now under sail. So he continued his course upon the seas, till he met with a ship belonging to Monsieur Gourdon, governor of Calais, in which was one Mr. Nevel Davies, who was return'd from a twelve years captivity in Spain; and who assur'd him, there was little hopes of any success this year in the West-Indies; for the king of Spain had sent express orders to all the ports, both of the Islands and Terra Firma, that no ships should stir that year, nor any treasure be laid aboard for Spain. But neither this disagreeable news, nor the other discouragements, could deter him from proceeding; till on the eleventh of May, when he was off Cape Finister, a most raging tempest arising, so scatter'd the greater part of the fleet, and sunk his boats and pinnaces, that, as the rest were driven and divided, Raleigh himself, in the Garland, was in great danger of being swallowed up in the sea. Hereupon, considering the season was too far gone for his enterprise upon Panama, and his victuals too much consum'd; that the same consumption might further disable him from lying upon the Spanish coast, or at the Islands, to meet with the Indian fleet, for which he had received such little encouragement to wait, Raleigh made a division of his fleet into two squadrons, committing one under the charge of Sir John Burgh, and the other to Sir Martin Frobisher; and gave his instructions for Sir Martin, in the Garland, with captain George Gifford, captain Henry Thynne, captain Grenvill, and others, to lie off the south cape to terrify and keep the Spaniards on their own coast; while Sir John Burgh, with captain Robert Cross, Thomson, and others, should lie at the Azores for the carracks from India. The success of these directions was answerable to the excellent judgment that contriv'd them. For the Spanish admiral, receiving intelligence that the English fleet was cruising upon their coast, gather'd all his naval power to watch Frobisher, and defend the southern parts of Spain; while the carracks, unguarded, were left a prey to Sir John Burgh. Before the fleet separated, they met on the Spanish coast with a great Biscayan, called Santa Clara, a

<sup>a</sup> See a report of the truth of the fight about the isles of Azores, this last summer, betwixt the Revenge, one of her majesty's ships, commanded by Sir Richard Grenvill, and an Armada of the king of Spain: 4to. 1591. reprinted, fol. in Hakluyt, vol. 2. 1599. part 2. p. 169. where it is said to be penn'd by the honourable Sir Walter Raleigh.

“ tasted abundantly of the queen's love, finding it now begin “ to decline, resolv'd to undertake an expedition to sea; “ and engaged several of his friends, of great quality, to “ be concern'd with him.” “ 'Tis pity but this author had satisfy'd us more expressly about that declension of the queen's love. For, I think, that her lending Raleigh her ships of war, and the honourable commission she gave him, to be general in this expedition, seem rather to contradict, than any ways confirm that insinuation.

ship of six hundred ton ; which, after a fight for sometime, they master'd, and found freighted with all sorts of little iron-work, valued by the English at six or seven thousand pounds ; but of treble the value to the Spaniards. This, having clear'd, they sent to England. Then Sir John Burgh, in a ship of Sir Walter Raleigh's, named the Roebuck, coasting along towards the south cape of St. Vincent ; and, by the way spying a sail, gave her chase ; which being a flyboat and good sailer, drew him far southward, before he could fetch her ; at last she came under his lee, and struck sail. The master confess'd a great fleet was prepar'd at St. Lucar and Cadiz ; for the rumour of Raleigh's putting out strong for the West-Indies had so alarmed the king of Spain, that he rais'd this fleet to oppose and encounter him ; tho' looking for the arrival of his East-India carracks, he first order'd those ships to convoy them from the Azores ; but persuading himself if Raleigh's fleet did make for the West-Indies, that then the islands would be infested only by some small men of war which the carracks of themselves would be able to cope with, his order was to Don Alphonso de Baçan to pursue Raleigh's fleet, and engage him, what course soever he held : and the English soon found this information true. For Sir John Burgh, not long after his having taken that flyboat, as he return'd to his company, descry'd the Spanish fleet to sea-ward of him ; which having likewise discover'd him, made full account to bring him into the Spanish harbour ; but he dexterously escaped them, and shaped his course to the Azores, according to Raleigh's directions. Here he took several small caravels ; but learnt little intelligence from them. Arriving at Flores on the 21st of June, and making to the shore of a village there, call'd Santa Cruz, he found them all in arms ; but, shewing signs of amity by a white flag, he was accommodated by the inhabitants with whatever he wanted. Here he learnt news of the East-Indian carracks, one whereof had lately passed by for Lisbon, and that four more were behind. He made after, and soon discover'd the foremost, named the Santa Cruz ; which was pressed so close upon by the English, that she fir'd her self ; but they took, besides some spoil, certain prisoners out of her, who confess'd, that within fifteen days three other greater carracks would arrive at the same island. Sir John, having taken counsel with his officers, departed six or seven leagues to the west of Flores, causing the ships in his company to spread themselves north and south two leagues distant from each other, by which extension they could discover two whole degrees. Thus they lay till the third of August, when captain Thomson first saw that prodigious great carrack, called the MADRE DE DIOS, or Mother of God, one of the greatest burden belonging to the crown of Portugal. Captain Thomson first attack'd her, but with the loss of several men ; then Sir John Burgh, in the Roebuck aforesaid, intangled her ; and Sir Robert Cross fasten'd himself to her at the same instant : but Sir John was forced to disengage a-while, for fear of sinking, being shot under-water. At last Cross fell athwart her all alone, prevented her running ashore to fire her self, as the other had done, and gave the rest time to come up to his succour ; which, after he had fought with her three hours, he receiv'd by the lord Cumberland's ships : and then, having made a great slaughter of the Spaniards, they boarded and possess'd themselves of her with little difficulty.

Another of great value.

THIS prize was reckon'd the greatest and richest that ever had been brought into England ; and when the news of her being taken arriv'd, Raleigh was no less diligent to have her safely conducted home, than the officers aforesaid had been in the taking of her. For, after consultation with Sir John Hawkins, his chief partner in this enterprise, they wrote a letter to the lord admiral, in these words ; “ Our very good lord, we have confer'd together about the East-Indian ship to be brought to Plymouth by Sir John Burgh ; and, in our opinions, she can be “ no less worth than five hundred thousand pounds ; being a ship of so great burden, and laden “ with so rich commodities as appeareth she is : wherefore we have consider'd, that the Spanish “ men of war, lying upon the coast of Bretagne, hearing of so great a prize taken from the “ king, or the merchants of the country ; and, envying that such a benefit should grow to us, “ to their hinderance and dishonour, will endeavour by all possible means, being distant but a “ day or night's sailing, either to recover the ship again, or to burn her and all her lading, “ rather than she shall be deliver'd here ; seeing that the places of defence where the ship may “ remain, are not able to resist their power : in our opinion therefore we think fit, and do pray “ your lordship, that the three ships of her majesty's which are appointed to keep the narrow seas, “ may, by your lordship's letter and directions, be appointed to go westward, and there to “ guard the Indian ship for a time, until the Gardland and some of the same fleet be return'd, “ whose arrival cannot be any long time expected ; or till some order may be taken for the “ unlading or keeping of her otherwise ; which we pray your lordship may be done with “ some expedition. And so we humbly take our leave, this 27th of August 1592. Your “ lordship's “ lordship’s humbly at commandment, W. Raleigh (and underneath) John Hawkins.”<sup>a</sup> By this means probably such care was taken, that this mighty ship was brought safe into Dartmouth on the 7th of September following, where it daily drew vast numbers of spectators from all parts to admire at the hugeness of it, being far beyond the model of the biggest shipping then known among us either for war or burden.<sup>b</sup> But as to the lading, tho’ Sir John Burgh did prudently seize upon the whole to her majesty’s use, to prevent all licentious spoil; whereby the treasure brought home was sufficient to recompense the adventurers cost, and the sailors peril, however, the dividends are not known, more than that her majesty had the largest share; and tho’, through the varieties thereof, our nation was let into the discovery of those merchandises, whereof we had before but an imperfect knowledge; yet the whole cargo, when it came to be landed and valued in England, fell short above two thirds of the computation which had been made by Raleigh and Hawkins, as above.<sup>c</sup> For it seems there were a large quantity of jewels, and of great value, which were never brought to light; and so much of her other goods was also purloin’d by the sailors, soldiers, and officers, that at her arrival in England, she drew five foot less water than she did when she was first freighted at Cochin in the East-Indies. And indeed the sailors themselves, whom neither order, oath, nor proclamation, could restrain, boldly confess’d, They had rather trust their souls to a merciful God by Perjury, than their fortunes to the hands of unmerciful men.<sup>d</sup>

THE latter end of this year, and beginning of next, we meet with Sir Walter Raleigh in the parliament-house, whether return’d for a county or a borough, and for which, does not at present particularly occur; but much engaged we find him there throughout this short session,<sup>e</sup> among the ablest heads both in committees, and as a publick speaker. A late author of his life observes, “ that his speeches were full of reason and eloquence, no man in his days being more a master of language than himself;”<sup>f</sup> and matter too, he might have added; none more satisfactorily confirming his arguments with facts and experience than he did, even in his unpremeditated speeches, no less than in the more deliberate compositions of his pen; so full of observation he was upon all times and countries, and so readily he could apply it upon all occasions; which now won him great regard, as a speaker in the house, and afterwards as an author, to the whole world. Soon after the opening of the session, we find him upon the committee for the liberties and privileges of the members, to examine and make report of all such cases touching the elections and returns of any the knights, citizens, burgessees, or barons of the house, as should arise during the said session of parliament: also in another against popish recusants. And when the bill for certain subsidies to be granted her majesty was in debate, and some members were for having it expressly distinguish’d in the bill, that the said subsidies should be for maintaining a war impulsive and defensive against the Spaniard, that the conquests we made over them might be legal and warrantable; Sir Walter Raleigh seconded those speeches, and said, “ He knew many, who held it not lawful in conscience, as the time was, to take prizes from the Spaniard; and he knew, that if it might be lawful and open war, there would be more voluntary hands to fight against the Spaniard than the queen should stand in need of to

It has also a seal (on soft yellow wax) of Raleigh’s coat of arms (hereafter mention’d) in a triangular escutcheon; but the crest (a stag, or other-like horned animal) is different from what he afterwards bore, as will be also observed in the sequel of this work.

and was, by moderate computation, valued at 150000 l. Sterling. See a true report of the honourable service at sea, perform’d by Sir John Burrough, lieutenant-general of the fleet, prepar’d by the honourable Sir Walter Raleigh, lord-warden, &c. in Hakluyt, vol. 2. part 2. p. 194. There was also printed another account of this great ship, while it lay in the port aforesaid, in Quarto, under this title, The Seaman’s Triumph, declaring the honourable actions of such gentlemen, captains, &c. as were at the taking of the great carack lately brought to Dartmouth, with her burden and commodities: also the manner of the fight with and burning of another at the Isle of Flowers, of the burden of 900 ton, written for truth, to a Gentleman of great worship in London. This gentleman, tho’ his name is not prefix’d to the dedication, was Sir Walter Raleigh, as may plainly appear to those who have read it, and are acquainted with the history of this action. I never saw but one of these pamphlets, which is in the possession of a nobleman, curious in collections of this kind; and remember to have read in it, that some jars of civit were, through unadvisedness of the sailors, thrown overboard; they not knowing what it was. But in the whole, this tract, as I remember, is not so particular and accurately written, as that account in Hakluyt aforesaid.

“ send to sea.” Accordingly he was appointed of the committee for drawing the articles and preamble of the said bill.<sup>a</sup> Further, when the necessity of the said subsidy came to be enforced, Ralegh spake for it, “ not only (as he protested) to please the queen, to whom he was infinitely bound above his deserts; but for the necessity he both saw and knew.” He very well discover’d the great strength of the king of Spain; and, to shew his mightiness, he told how he possess’d all the world; as also that his malice and ill purpose was evident to this realm, he shewed how on every side he had beleagu’d us. “ That in Denmark, the king being young, had corrupted the council and nobility; so as it was very likely he would speed himself of shipping from thence. In the marine towns of the Low-Countries, and in Norway, he laid in great store of shipping. In France, he had the parliament-towns at his command; in Britany, he had all the best havens; and in Scotland, had so corrupted the nobility, that he had promis’d them forces to assist the papists; that they were ready to join with any foreign forces that would make them strong, to be by themselves and resist others; for, as he thought, there were not six gentlemen of that country of one religion. In his own country, there is all possible preparing; and he is coming with sixty gallies, besides other shipping, with purpose to annoy us. We must then have no ships, if he invade us riding at anchor; all will be little enough to withstand him. At his coming, he fully resolveth to get Plymouth, or at least to possess some of the havens this summer within our land; and Plymouth is a place of most danger, for no ordnance can be carried thither to remove him, the passages will not give leave. Now the way to defeat him, is to send a royal army to supplant him in Britany, and to possess our selves there; and to send a strong navy to sea, and to lye upon the Cape and at Lambuck; to which places come all his ships with riches from all parts, and then they may set upon all that come. This we are able to do, and undoubtedly with fortunate success, if we undertake it.”<sup>b</sup> But some division arising upon the question how they should make the motion for this supply to the lords, Ralegh made so judicious a distinction of the cause thereof, and so clearly demonstrated the erroneous manner in which it had been propounded, that it appears plainly, the successful turn which follow’d thereupon was owing to him alone. For, said Ralegh, “ had the question but been put, whether they should only yield to a conference in general with the lords? the house would not have been against it;” therefore desir’d the speaker to put it to the question, whether they should confer with the lords generally or not, without naming the subsidy? This motion was so well liked, that Ralegh was desir’d by the house to repeat it over again, that it might be better heard by them all. Thereupon he said, “ that as it had been lately receiv’d in the negative, he would not make it a question again, for by the order of the house he could not;” but propounded it as a new question, “ Whether the house would be pleased to have a general conference with the lords, touching the great and imminent dangers of the realm and state, and the present necessary supply of treasure to be provided speedily for the same, according to the proportion of the necessity?” Being stated in this manner, it was assented to by the whole house, without one negative voice.<sup>c</sup> But one of the members, Mr. Oliver St. John, making some misconstruction of the vice-chamberlain’s speech upon this occasion, Sir Walter Ralegh further explain’d the matter agreed upon by the house to him, in these words. “ If we confer generally, it must be of our dangers, and of the remedies, which must be by means; if of means, it must be of money and aid. So our conference must needs be of subsidy, or rather aid: but to agree upon this with any resolution either in the matter or substance, it is not our meaning.”<sup>d</sup> After this conference, several forms of provision were propos’d by way of treble subsidies, and like proportionable fifteenths and tenths, with other kinds of benevolence; and many excellent speeches passed upon that part of this important affair. Sir Thomas Cecill was for three subsidies to be paid in four years, and to be charged upon men of ten pounds and upwards, to spare those who were under. Sir Henry Knivet alledged the poverty of our country against the reasons used, and imputed that poverty to the bringing in more foreign wares, than we vented commodities, whereby our money was carried out of our country, which was thus become like a pond that was fed with a spring, but having a breach, through which more passed away than came in: thereupon moved for a survey to be taken of all mens lands and goods in England, and so much to be yearly levied as might maintain the queen’s wars, the proportion being set a hundred thousand pounds yearly; or, if that was disliked, every man on his word should deliver in, to his power, the profits of his lands and goods; so a proportion to be cess'd accordingly. To him who argued of the poverty of the land, from the multitude of beggars, Raleigh gave these reasons: "That the broken companies in Normandy and the Low-Countries, who returned maimed hither, never went back again to the towns from whence they came: for a multitude of clothiers, taking their looms into their hands, spun their wool themselves; and except we would work for them cheaper than they can make themselves, they will set none to work. This engrossing of so many trades into their own hands, beggars so many as usually lived by the trade." As for the surveying of so many mens estates, he thought it inconvenient. "For many, being esteemed richer than they are, would be found beggars, and increase the opinion of their number, by losing their credit, which is now their wealth. He further reported of his own knowledge, that the West-Country, since the parliament begun, had taken from them the worth of four hundred and forty thousands pound; and that those of Newcastle lay still for fear, because the Bourdeaux fleet was taken this year by the enemy. For the enemy approaching us, and being become our neighbour, our trades will decay every day, and so our poverty increases. Thus it is most certain; the longer we defer aid, the less able we shall be to yield it; yet in the end, the greater aid will be required; so sparing them now, we shall charge them when they shall be less able to bear it: for it is most true, one hundred thousand pounds would have done the last year, that which three will not now do; and three will do this year, that which six will not do hereafter." In the conclusion, he agreed to three subsidies; in them, the three pound-men to be spared; the sum which came from them, to be levied upon those of ten pound and upwards; and the payment to be speedy.<sup>a</sup> Mr. Francis Bacon assented to three subsidies; but not to the payments under six years: but to his reasons of difficulty and danger in a speedier levy, which might hazard a double peril, by making it four shillings in the pound, a double payment; Raleigh answer'd, "I see no reason that the suspicion of discontentment should cross the provision for the present danger. The time is now more dangerous than it was in eighty-eight; for then the Spaniard coming from Spain, was to pass dangerous seas, and had no place of retreat or relief if he fail'd: but now he has in Britany great store of shipping; a landing-place in Scotland; and men and horses there as good as any we have. But for the difficulty in getting this subsidy, I think it seems more difficult by speaking, than it would be in gathering." In the end, it was carried agreeable to his propositions; the grant of a triple subsidy being agreed to, and of six fifteenths and tenths; to be levied and paid in four years, by a certain form which they had set down in articles; that is to say, one entire subsidy and two fifteenths and tenths at one payment in the first year; and one other entire subsidy, with two fifteenths and tenths at another payment in the second year; and one entire subsidy and two fifteenths and tenths at two payments in the third and fourth years.<sup>c</sup>

Soon after there was a bill read in the house against counterfeiting the bands of counsellors or principal officers; and upon the second reading, it was committed to Sir John Woolley and Sir Walter Raleigh, with others. But after a meeting in the Middle Temple hall, Sir John made report to the house, that himself, and the residue of the committee, upon the end of their examination and travel therein, did all of them think it a very dangerous bill; and not fit, in their opinion, to pass the house; to whose consideration they further thought proper to leave it. And because it was a bill which came from the lords, they thought good, with the said report first made, to deliver the said bill again into this house, and there to leave it as it is, and not otherwise. But the bill against aliens selling foreign wares among us by retail, produced several weighty arguments and speeches in the house, which have been transmitted to us. These foreigners it seems were Dutchmen, who had nestled themselves in St. Martins, anciently allow'd for a sanctuary, and therefore still had this privilege: here they practis'd spinning and weaving, to the great detriment and complaint of merchants and regular dealers in our own city; insomuch that threescore English retailers had been ruin'd by them since the last parliament, to the diminution, besides their own private substance, of the queen's subsidy and the publick treasure of the kingdom; twenty thousand pounds a year at least having been carried out of the realm by them. They had indeed some learned council who pleaded for them at the bar, and some of the members spoke in their behalf. One of them said, this bill was thrust into the house by our mercantile engrossers; that their beggaring the domestick retailers might be imputed to the strangers retailing. But he was answered by another with arguments to prove that engrossing was sufferable among merchants. Others again ran upon the more universal topics of charity, in giving shelter and means of getting livelihood to poor destitute strangers, who fly to us for religion and relief: that we have been strangers, and allow'd the liberty we deny; that now they are strangers, and we may be so hereafter. Again, that it was an honour for one country to be hospitable to another; would extend its renown; increase its riches; strengthen its interest; and induce them to a mutual return of favours: lastly, that their example is profitable, through the patterns of piety and industry they disperse among us. Other arguments were used; but against these, Raleigh concurr'd with those who thought that denization ought not to circumvent birth-right; and that to behave our selves like citizens to foreigners, was but making our selves strangers to our neighbours. “Whereas it is pretended (says he) that for strangers, it is against charity, against honour, against profit, to expel them; in my opinion, it is no matter of charity to relieve them. For first, such as fly hither have forsaken their own king; and religion is no pretext for them, for we have no Dutchmen here, but such as come from those princes where the gospel is preach'd; yet here they live, disliking our church. For honour: it is honour to use strangers as we be used among strangers; and it is a lightness in a commonwealth, yea, a baseness in a nation, to give a liberty to another nation which we cannot receive again. In Antwerp, where our intercourse was most, we were never suffer'd to have a taylor or a shoo-maker to dwell. Nay, at Milan, where there are three hundred-pound Englishmen, they cannot so much as have a barber among them. And for profit; they are all of the house of Almoigne, who pay nothing; yea, eat out our profits, and supplant our own nation. Custom indeed they pay; paying fifteen-pence where we pay twelve-pence; but they are discharged of subsidies. The nature of the Dutchman is to fly to no man but for his profit; and they will obey no man long; now under Spain; now under Mountfort; now under the prince of Orange; but under no governor long. The Dutchman, by his policy, hath gotten trading with all the world into his hands; yea, he is now entering into the trade of Scarborough-fishing, and the fishing of the Newfoundlands, which is the stay of the West-Countries. They are the people that maintain the king of Spain in his greatness; were it not for them, he were never able to make out such armies and navies by sea; it cost her majesty sixteen thousand pounds a year the maintaining of these countries; and for all this, they arm her enemies against her. Therefore, I see no reason that such respect should be given to them: and, to conclude; in the whole, no matter of honour, no matter of charity, no profit in relieving them.”<sup>a</sup> This speech we may meet with in some modern writings, quoted in Sir Walter Raleigh's praise, both for his knowledge in the interest of his country, and his unbiass'd affection in exerting it. As for the bill, he was one to whom it was committed, and who, after the travels of the said committee upon it, offer'd it again to the house with the addition of a proviso. On the 27th of March following, that is to say, in the year 1593, it was read the third time; and, after many long speeches, which are not specify'd, passed upon the question, by the division of the house, with the difference of fourscore voices; the Yeas being a hundred sixty-two, the Noes eighty-two. About a week afterwards there was a bill, for explaining a branch in an act to retain the queen's subjects in due obedience, read; and many speeches pass'd in the house before it was committed, through the many imperfections in the preamble and body of the said bill. For it pretended a punishment only of the Brownists and other sectaries; but, alledging nothing against them in particular, contained some ensnaring clauses that might comprehend more innocent persons. As the speeches before Sir Walter Raleigh's, on this occasion, are not rehearsed, we can only guess at them, by what is preserv'd of his; who said, “In my conceit, the Brownists are worthy to be rooted out of a commonwealth:<sup>b</sup> but what danger may grow to our selves if this law pass, were fit to be

<sup>b</sup> This sect was so call'd from Robert Brown, son of Anthony Brown Esq; of Tolthorp in Rutlandshire, and grandson of Francis Brown, whom king Henry VIII. Anno Regn. 18. privileg'd by charter to wear his cap in presence of himself, his heirs, or any of his nobles, and not to uncover but at his own pleasure. This Robert studied divinity in Cambridge, and was soon discover'd by Dr. Still, master of Trinity-College, to have somewhat extraordinary in him that would prove a great disturbance to the Church. He travel'd to Zeland, and return'd, as we are told, confirm'd in error and obitnacy, which he first preach'd at Norwich Anno 1581, and wrote a book to justify his doctrine; for which bishop Phreak of that diocese confin'd him: but being related to the lord Burghley, and he rather imputing it to zeal than malice, interceded to have him charitably persuaded out of his opinions, and released. The latter being done, he was sent home in 1585, but remain'd incorrigible; wherefore his good old father would own him for his son no longer than his son own'd the Church of England for his mother; but he chose rather to part with his aged sire than his new schism: so, with Richard Harrison a schoolmaster, he set up for an orator against bishops and all ecclesiastical authority. When gentleness was found ineffectual, severity was so long, and upon so many occasions exercis'd, that this Brown used to boast he had been committed to thirty-two prisons, and in some could not see his hand at noon-day; yet did he to the last save his life and living, which was Achurch in Northamptonshire. This favour is conceived to proceed from the promises he made of conformity, together with the interest of his powerful kindred. He allowed a salary for one to discharge his cure; and tho' he oppos'd his parishioners in judgment, yet agreed in taking their tithes. He was of a nature uncontrollable, so far from the Sabbatarian strictness, afterwards espou'd by some of his followers, that he seem'd rather a libertine therein. In a word, he had (says my author) a wife with whom he never lived, and a church in which he never preach'd; tho' he receiv'd the profits thereof; and as all the other sects

“ be consider’d. For it is to be fear’d that men not guilty will be included in it: and that “ law is hard, that taketh life, and sendeth into banishment; where mens Intentions shall be “ judged by a jury; and they shall be judges what another means. But that law, which is “ against a fact, is but just; and punish the fact as severely as you will. If two or three thou“ sand Brownists meet at the sea, at whose charge shall they be transported, or whither will “ you send them? I am sorry for it, but I am afraid there are near twenty thousand of them in “ England; and when they are gone, who shall maintain their wives and children?”<sup>a</sup> A committee was therefore appointed to revise and correct this bill, among whom Raleigh is the foremost named; who, after many subtractions, alterations and debates, moved it might be read to the house for their approbation: and, after many arguments and conferences, being read the third time, as were also the additions and amendments, it passed upon the question. Raleigh was frequently in committees upon other bills during this session, till it was dissolved on the 10th of April following; but as his arguments upon them are not preserv’d, we shall refer to the titles of these bills in the journals of parliament, whence we have extracted his speeches upon those before mention’d.

THIS year we met with a notable libel in print, set forth by a Lover of his Country, as he calls himself, to expose and scandalize certain ministers and counsellors of state, who had been instrumental in framing that searching proclamation against the Seminaries which was publish’d about two years before.<sup>b</sup> For the king of Spain having lately founded an English cloyster at Valladolid, as a nursery to supply us with treason and rebellion; so many hopeful stocks of that species were soon transplanted into England, as occasion’d the said proclamation to extirpate them. Now this Answer was publish’d to calumniate the supposed authors of it; and as Raleigh appears, among other very good company, to have his share of the slander therein; so he might probably have had a hand in those wholesome articles for the safety of the realm, which occasion’d it. For, to the great honour of his knowledge in the constitution of his country, and his constant zeal for its security and welfare, he was, tho’ no counsellor of state, often call’d to the council table; where no small difference was paid to his arguments and observations in the various debates that arose upon matters in church or state, in war or peace. After this libel has revil’d the greatest and wisest ministers of the nation, it seems to have reserved the quintessence for him, who had the ability so many ways to crush the pernicious purposes which were daily hatching by the viperous brood which brought it forth; tho’ after all, by embarking his character in such an old and shatter’d bottom of detraction, ’tis much they could so long keep its weather-beaten credit a-float: and indeed, how they came to launch first out into such an improbable contumely, seems a mystery comprehensible only to the patron of their iniquity.
 For Raleigh had given such proofs of his sound and sincere affection to religion, some of which have in the foregoing pages been noted, that his sentiments were made use of to reform or regulate even the professors of it; yet now his head must be turn’d so excessively to its detriment, as to provoke this libeller’s pious spleen against nothing less than Sir Walter Raleigh’s School of Atheism; compendiously insinuating, as if truly he was not satisfied with being a disciple, but set up for a doctor in his faculty, and won young “ gentlemen into his said school; wherein “ the Old and New Testament were jested at, and scholars taught to spell God backwards.”
 Then he complains, “ what a miserable thing it is, that her majesty should make laws “ and proclamations according to these mens senses and opinions.”<sup>c</sup> But there may need little pains

of his life were stormy and turbulent, so was his end; for the constable of his parish requiring somewhat roughly the payment of certain rates, his passion moved him to blows, whereof complaint being made to Justice St. John, he rather inclin’d to pity than punish him; but Brown, at fair words also disgusted, ceased not till he was sent to Northampton jail on a bed in a cart, being very infirm, and aged above eighty years; where soon after he sicken’d and died Anno 1630. Thus the church historians have painted out this story, but in larger dimensions. See Fidler, &c. As for Brown’s tenets, ’tis said one Bulston had preach’d them among us, and that they are only revived from the ancient Donatists; but those, who think it worth while to hunt more distinctly after them, may read Dr. Fulk; Rogers on the sixteenth article; Dayrel against the Brownists; Breckwell’s Detection of Glover the Brownist; Gifford’s Treatise of English Donatists; with his Reply to Barrone and Greenwood; and Stow’s Chronicle; where it appears the Brownist’s books were prohibited by authority, and that some were hang’d for dispersing them, with such-like writings. There is a volume (containing some ingenious remarks) ascribed to the earl of Argyle, and named the Happy future State of England, which fol. 280.

pains to blunt the point of this dart, when we shall further consider that it came out of a jesuitical quiver ; for by whom should it be levell'd against him but Robert Parsons, the notorious traitor and incendiary ! however deeply he disguis'd himself into a Lover of his Country. So that, till we shall find a more credible father for the aspersions, we may safely enough believe it no genuine issue of truth : nevertheless, some ten years after, when Raleigh was trampled down by the court, and there was a turn of state to serve, this might be a good serviceable obloquy enough to upbraid him with, and depreciate him in the eye of the populace. But these prejudic'd representations will probably be thought of so little authority, that the reasons and matter of fact which have been produc'd in a poetical performance, may be sufficient to make those stains even befriend his reputation, and brighten it in clearing them away.<sup>a</sup>

INDEED there is a traditional author who accounts for the grounds of this aspersion, in the following words ; “ Sir Walter Raleigh was the first (as I have heard) who ventur'd to tack “ about, and sail aloof from the beaten tract of the schools ; and who, upon the discovery of “ so apparent an error as a Torrid Zone, intended to proceed in an inquisition after more solid “ truths : till the mediation of some, whose livelihood lay in hammering shrines for this super-“ annuated study, possessed queen Elizabeth that such doctrine was against God, no less than “ her father's honour ; whose faith (if he owned any) was grounded upon school divinity :
“ whereupon she chid him ; who was (by his own confession) ever after branded with the ti“ tle of an atheist, tho' a known assertor of God and Providence.”<sup>b</sup> That he was such as-sertor, seems to be affirmed by an author of his acquaintance, who introduces the apparition of Sir Walter, speaking to him in this manner. “ Thou well knowest that the world hath, at “ sundry times, cast a foul and most unjust aspersion upon me for my presumed denial of a “ Deity ; from which abominable and horrible crime I was ever most free ; and not any man
“ now living better knows the same than thy self ; in whose presence I was often accusom'd “ highly to praise and esteem the book of Lessius, written in proof of the being of a Deity.”
So requests, that he would translate the same into English, “ which I my self, says the ghost, had “ done, if cruel fate had not untimely cut off the thread of my mortality ; and let the title bear “ my name ; that so the readers may acknowledge it was done by my sollicitation.” Then the said translator of that book says in his own person to the reader, “ It is well known that “ Sir Walter was a man of great natural parts ; and yet was suspected of the most foul and exe“ crable crime of atheism ; how truly God and himself only knows ; yet I have reason to think “ it a false aspersion.”<sup>c</sup> If thus much is said of Raleigh by an author who knew him ; what credit shall we pay to another who wrote many years later ? never knew him, produces no authority for the principles he charges upon him ; yet pretends to give us the tutor's name from whom he imbib'd them ; and that, a man of no less learning and merit than the famous Mr. Thomas Hariot ?<sup>d</sup> This was that English philosopher from whose illustrious discoveries, he, who was the glory of the French philosophers, is not denied to have borrowed much of the against certain catholic books, says, “ Among other er“ rors committed by him therein, it was one, that he “ would suffer all Parsons's seditious books to pass cur“ rent ; as his Philopater, speaking most rebelliously “ against her majesty and the whole state and nobles of “ the land.” See his Quodlibets of religion and state,

light wherewith he shone: <sup>a</sup> this was that excellent mathematician, who, says our author Wood aforesaid, “coming to the knowledge of this heroic knight Sir Walter Raleigh, was entertain’d by him in his family, who allow’d him a yearly pension, <sup>b</sup> and was instructed by him at leisure hours in that science.” <sup>c</sup> This was that virtuous and religious man, who, being sent over by Sir Walter Raleigh with his first colony to Virginia, but did not bear him company, as the said author mistakes, to survey the bounds of the English discoveries, with the commodities and customs of the country, did first communicate the gospel to those heathen inhabitants; and, “in every town where he came, explained to them the contents of the Bible; declaring, that therein was set forth the true and only God, and his mighty works; that therein was contain’d the true doctrine of salvation through Christ; with many particulars of miracles and chief points of religion, as I was able then to utter (continues he) and thought fit for the time. And tho’ I told them the book, materially and of itself, was not of such vertue as I thought they did conceive, but only the doctrine therein contain’d; yet would many be glad to touch it, to embrace it, to kiss it, to hold it to their breasts and heads, and stroke over all their bodies with it, to shew their hungry desire of that knowledge which was spoken of.” <sup>d</sup> Yet this is the man whom the above-cited Anthony Wood charges with having had strange thoughts of the scripture; with undervaluing the old story of the creation; with never believing that trite position Ex nihilo nihil fit; with making a philosophical Theology, wherein he cast off the Old Testament; so that consequently the New would have no foundation. Further, with being a Deist, and imparting his doctrine to the earl of Northumberland, into whose service Raleigh had recommended him, and of whom he also receiv’d a yearly pension of a hundred and twenty pounds. Lastly, with infusing those principles likewise into Sir Walter Raleigh himself, when he was compiling his History of the World. This last insinuation, and probably all the rest, is surely a manifest slander, as Wood himself must have own’d, if he had sufficiently read that History of the World; where Sir Walter Raleigh has, in many places, given stronger evidences of his Christian faith, than any of his detractors ever did of theirs. And however Harriot might controvert certain theological matters with some divines of those times, which made them have no good opinion of him (says Wood) and look upon the manner of his death as a judgment; not unlike the charity of some divines in all times; yet enough of his religious character <sup>e</sup> might be said, as there has been of his patron, Sir Walter Raleigh’s, to clear them both from this common and threadbare calumny.

As for Raleigh, what might not a little sharpen these detractions against him, was perhaps a grant about this time made him from the crown of some church-lands; a course of reward usual with queen Elizabeth towards such as had perform’d any considerable services for the state. The <sup>a</sup> This assertion will further appear to any who shall have the curiosity to consult the late learned Dr. John Wallis, in his treatise of Algebra, where he compares the improvements which Harriot made, with what Descartes has advanced, as his own, without mentioning the name of this Englishman in his Geometry; and gives it clearly on Harriot’s side. Nay, this Plagiarism was so well known, as to have been objected against Monsieur Descartes in his own country; and the Frenchman, who has paid the singular honours to his memory of writing his life, having confess’d it was the opinion of some, that he stole his method of Algebra from one Harriot, an Englishman, does not go about to contradict it. See the life of Monsieur Descartes, translated from the French by S. R. 8vo. Lond. 1693. p. 283.

<sup>e</sup> For would Dr. Richard Corbet, as orthodox a divine as any of them, and afterwards a bishop of the Church, tell Sir Thomas Aylesbury, That Harriot’s deep mine was without dross, if it had any such allay? See his Poems, 8vo. 3d edit. 1672. p. 56. Would another as grave and virtuous an author as any in those times, Mr. George Chapman, his contemporary, tell all who knew him, in the preface to his Homer’s Iliad, “That some places he had shewn to his worthy and most learned friend Mr. Harriot; whose judgment and knowledge in all kinds I know (says he) to be incomparable and bottomless; yea, to be admir’d as much, as his most blameless life, and the story, as we are forc'd to gather it from those authors, by whom it has not been over-favourably told, is, That about the year 1594<sup>a</sup> the bishop of Salisbury, Dr. John Coldwell, who had been bred a physician, gave his see a strong purge, by alienating the manor of Sherborne to Sir Walter Raleigh. Sir John Harrington, before quoted, speaks of an ominous presage, to make his tale as affecting as he can to prince Henry, and insinuate the displeasure even of Heaven against Sir Walter Raleigh; where he observes, "That Sir Walter, using often to ride

“right sacred expence of his time, is to be honour’d and reverenc’d; if this were not his true character.” Nor is it likely the earl of Northumberland would also have made such a man a domestic, and allowed him so handsome a salary, to have infected his sons with atheistical principles: neither would Harriot’s noble executors, Sir Thomas Aylesbury, and Robert Sidney, viscount Lisle, have bestowed on him in St. Christopher’s Church, London, where he was buried in July 1621, a monument, since destroyed by the great fire, with an inscription that might have been contradicted by all the town, if it had been false; beginning as follows: Omnes scientias calluit, & in omnibus excelluit; Mathematicis, Philosophicis, Theologicis, veritatis indagator studiosissimus, Dei Trinitus cultor piissimus, &c. As to the manner of his death, Dr. Alex. Rhead, in his works, Lond. 1650. treat. 2. lect. 26. speaking of the lip, says, “That cancerous ulcers often seize on that part; and that this grief hastned the end of that famous mathematician Mr. Harriot, with whom I was acquainted (says he) but a short time before his death.” He adds none of those scandalous reflections aforesaid; and whether it begun first in his lip, seems not to have known; tho’ possibly the brass instruments which mathematicians are so familiar with, and, for readiness, often hold in their mouths, might occasion such a disease. But I have seen an epigram in MS. as old as the time of his death, which makes an allusion or comparison between the ulcer in Mr. Harriot’s Nose, and that in Count Gondomar’s Posteriors (who had a Fistula) and my reader may see that Epigram too, if he pleases; for it is lately printed by Mr. Morgan, in his Phoenix Britannicus, or Revival of scarce Tracts, 4to. 1731. p. 368. As to his learned writings, they are mentioned by Ant. Wood; but not all of them, for he wrote a Chronicle of Virginia, besides the Brief Report thereof before quoted; and mentions the particulars of that Chronicle in the said Brief Report. See Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 280.

 " post in these days, upon no small employments, between Plymouth and the court, when " Sherborne castle being right in the way, he cast such an eye upon it, as Ahab did (says he) upon
 " Naboth's vineyard; and once above the rest being talking of it; of the commodiousness of " the place; of the strength of the seat; and how easily it might be got from the bishoprick;
 " suddenly, over and over came his horse; that his very face, which was then thought a very " good face, plough'd up the earth where he fell. This fall was ominous, I make no question " (says he) as the like was observ'd in the lord Hastings, &c. but his brother Adrian would " needs have him interpret that, not as a courtier, but as a conqueror, it presaged the quiet
 " possession thereof. And this, through the queen's favour, came to pass:"<sup>b</sup> for after Dr. John Piers was translated to York, this Dr. Coldwell was elected to succeed him in the see of Salisbury; but it lay vacant three years: in which dangerous juncture for denial, all the Doctor's church-preferments being dispos'd of, yet before his election was confirm'd, Sir Walter Raleigh (as the church-historians have colour'd it out) assaulted his consent; importun'd him to pass Sherborne to the crown, and effected it; so shot the good old man (as one of them phrases it) between wind and water; tho' indeed (confesses) a good round rent was reserved to the bishoprick. Then Sir Walter begg'd the same of the queen, and obtain'd it; much after the same method Sir William Killigrew got the manor of Crediton (a bough almost as big as the rest of the body) from the church of Exeter, by the consent of bishop Babington.<sup>c</sup> We shall leave it for Harrington to determine whether Raleigh, who was now so high in the queen's favour, might with less suit than he was fain to make to her before he could perfect this purchase (as he perhaps at last justly calls it) and with less money than he bestowed afterwards on Sherborne, in buying out leases and in drawing the river through rocks into his garden, have compassed a better, without giving umbrage to church or state: while from others we observe, that Raleigh embellish'd his sovereign's bounty with great magnificence and commendation; not that he was in danger thereby of falling under the remark he has made on common builders of sumptuous seats, That men are rather known by their houses, than their houses by them; <sup>d</sup> it not being easy for him, who had been such a solid architect in the temple of fame, to make his habitation more considerable than its inhabitant, or raise any edifice with his fortune, which should be more illustrious than what he had already founded by his virtue. Yet his elegant taste in building is sufficiently attested by an author who survey'd the improvements he made upon this estate when they were fresh and in their splendor, and who tells us, "That the queen having " granted the see-farm of Sherborne to Sir Walter Raleigh, he began to build the castle very " fairly; but altering his purpose, he built in the park adjoining a most fine house, which he
 " beautified with orchards, gardens, and groves of much variety and great delight: so that, whe" ther you consider the pleasantness of the seat, the goodness of the soil, or the other delica" cies belonging to it, it rests (says he) unparallel'd by any in these parts."<sup>e</sup> How he came afterwards to be juggled out of it, may also sufficiently appear when we arrive at the latter part of his life. But here, since we have touch'd something upon gardening, we may take an opportunity of remembring a plantation of his, which is somewhat observable. A late author mentions it with respect to him, but in a distant manner; where, telling us, "That " Beddington near Croydon in Surrey, is a neat curious seat, built by Sir Francis Carew,"<sup>f</sup> he further adds; "The orchards and gardens are very pleasant, and especially famous for

Where he also observes, that among the acts passed in king James the first's parliament, none were more beneficial for the church, than that which made the king himself and his successors incapable of any such church-land to be convey'd to them; yet some (adds he) were so bold as to conceive this law void in the very making of it, and that all the obligations thereof confided (not in the strength of the law) but only in the king's and his successors voluntary obedience thereunto: accounting it injurious for any prince in parliament to tie up his successors, who neither can nor will be concluded thereby further than it stands with their own convenience: however, it was to stand in force till the same power should be pleased to rescind it.

<sup>f</sup> Fuller, in his Worthies of Surrey, says, it was Sir Nicholas Carew (put to death by king Henry VIII. for retorting some sharp words upon him, with more truth than discretion) who built the fair house, or palace rather, at Beddington, which by the advantage of the water is a paradise of pleasure. However Sir Francis, who was a curious and polite gentleman, and lived very nobly here the latter end of queen Elizabeth's reign, did enrich it with considerable improvements.

“ the orange-trees, which have now grown there above these hundred years ; being planted, in the “ open-ground, under a moveable covert, during the winter months : they were the first that were “ brought into England, by a knight of that noble family ; who deserves no less commenda“ tion than Lucullus met with for bringing cherry and filbert-trees out of Pontus into Italy ;
 “ for which he is celebrated by Pliny and others.”<sup>a</sup> Now it has been a constant tradition at Beddington, that this knight of that noble family was Sir Walter Raleigh, who was allied thereto, if not otherwise, by the last of that surname’s adopting his near kinsman, a Throgmorton, to be his heir, on condition that he would assume the name and arms of Carew :<sup>b</sup> and how Raleigh became related to the Throgmortons, will in a little space appear. But that we might not here want such further confirmation, as the place will afford, of the first planter of that famous orangery, whereof there are several trees still flourishing of the original plantation, which are the stateliest and most perfect bearers of this fruit in England, I have been oblig’d with the gentleman’s An- swer to the Enquiry, who now dwells at the seat ; and his words are, “ ’Tis the common opinion “ of this family, that Sir Walter Raleigh, who was related to it, brought over and planted the “ old orange-trees here.”<sup>c</sup> But in the house they preserv’d a fine cabbin-bed which was his, having furniture of green silk and legs carved like dolphins, gilt with gold. In short, the seat was now so frequented, that not only Raleigh and other courtiers, but the queen received here many agreeable entertainments ;<sup>d</sup> for some of which she could not escape the censure of her jesuited enemies.

OF the other places of residence which Raleigh might have, besides what is before-men-tion’d, to compass a perfect knowledge, would need more time and pains than at last perhaps might be thought necessary here to bestow. As to the seat at West-Horsely in Surrey, there is good authority that it was in the possession of his son, as will be further observ’d, if not his own ; and in the hall of that house, there are in several places of the walls and ciel-ing the arms of Raleigh still visible.<sup>e</sup> But there is a house no farther from London than Isling- ton, about a bow’s-shot on this side the church, which, tho’ I think it has no such evidences remaining upon its walls, cieling, or windows, that will prove him to have been its owner, the arms that are seen there, above a hundred years old, being of a succeeding inhabitant ; is <sup>a</sup> Addit. to Camden’s Britan. translat. by the present bishop of London, fol. 1695. p. 166. upon which we may observe, tho’ the English have not been so grateful as the Romans were in celebrating those worthy persons, who have made the like beneficial importations to the lasting ornament and fertility of their country ; yet that we have had some authors not altogether silent in these vegetable antiquities, from whom we learn, that Dr. Linacre first brought into this land that prince of flowers the Damask Rose ; that the Perdigwen Plum, with two kinds more, were first made natives of this soil by Thomas lord Cromwell, when he return’d from his travels ; and the Apricock, by a priest named Wolfe, gardener to king Henry VIII. In this reign were also first propagated among us Hops and Artichokes ; and then were Cherry orchards first planted here, about Sittingbourne in Kent, with a more improv’d kind of that fruit, brought from Flanders by one Harris, another of that king’s gardeners : but what effect Cardan’s recommendation of Olive-trees had with king Edward VI. I find not. In the reign of queen Elizabeth, when Edmund Grindal, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, return’d from exile, he first transported the Tamerisk, so useful in medicine against diseases of the Spleen. Then also after our opening a trade with Zant, the shrub which bears the currans was first transplanted hither. In 1578 the Tulip first shewed her gaudy garment in English ground ; and, lastly, not to extend further on this subject now, as for the profitable plant Tobacco, and that princely one the Orange-tree, enough is said above, in the body of this work, to the honour of Sir Walter Raleigh.

 ment for queen Elizabeth at Beddington, led her majesty, after dinner, to a Cherry-tree in his garden, which had on it fruit in their prime, then above a month after all cherries had taken their farewell of England. This retardation he perform’d by straining a tent or canvas cover over the whole tree, and wetting it as the weather requir’d with a scoop ; so by obstructing the sun-beams, they grew both great, and were very long before they gain’d their perfect cherry-colour ; and when he was assur’d of the time her majesty would come, he remov’d the tent, and

“ a few sunny days brought them to their full maturity.” See his Garden of Eden, 12mo. 1655. p. 165.

<sup>e</sup> With a draught whereof having been oblig’d (among many other useful particulars) by the ingenious Mr. George Vertue, I find that coat agree with the arms upon Sir Walter Raleigh’s seal in yellow wax to the letter before exhibited ; and also with the draught represented before his life, in Prince’s Worthies of Devon ; where, as this author blazons it, he bears Gules, three Fusils in Bend Argent. But Prince further adds, a Label of three Points Azure ; which the draught from Horsely-Hall does not specify : neither do I remember to have observed this distinction in the impression of Sir Walter Raleigh’s said seal. Nor is it in that seal, of which a fair impression remains, upon another letter he wrote about this time to the lord-treasurer’s secretary Hext or Hicks, also before-mention’d ; and lately communicated to me by the obliging James West Esq; where the crest is the same with that in the other seal ; but in the dexter-chief of the shield, that other family-distinction of a martlet, as I take it. As for his crest, it appears in those seals as I before remark’d, to have been a stag, or other like animal ; but at Horsely, and under the sculpture of Sir Walter Raleigh, before his History of the World, it is, I think, a Cap of Honour ; to which possibly it might afterwards be chang’d for his further merits of it. And as for the motto, it is at Horsely, Amore Et virtute ; as also to his arms before the history aforesaid. Hooker, in his dedication of the Hisb chronicles, often before-quoted, explaining or mythologising the signatures of Raleigh’s arms, shews us at the same time what they were. For telling him he is taught to be careful in restoring the house of his decay’d fore-fathers, not only by their good examples, but also by the ensigns of their and his own nobility ; he adds, “ the Fusils being an instrument of travel and labour, adver“ tise you that you are one of the sons of Adam, born to “ walk in a vocation, and therein to be a profitable “ member of the Church of God, and in maintenance “ of the common society. The white colour or silver “ metal, doth teach you virtue, sincerity, and godli“ ness, &c. And therewith also, which by the gules co“ lour is meant—You be bold and valiant for the defence “ of your country, and for the safety thereof to spend “ both life and goods : such were your ancestors, and “ so it shall be with you,” &c. which, by the way, was a perfect prophecy.

yet popularly reported to have been a villa of his. For the present tenant affirms, “ his land“ lord <sup>a</sup> was possess’d of some old-account-books, by which it appears beyond all doubt this house
 “ and fourteen acres of land, now let at about seventy pounds per Ann. did belong to Sir Walter “ Raleigh; and that the oldest man in the parish <sup>b</sup> would often declare his father had told him, “ Sir Walter purposed to wall in that ground, with intention to keep some of his horses therein;
 “ further, that some husbandmen ploughing up the same a few years since, found several pieces “ of queen Elizabeth’s money, whereof they brought, whatever they might reserve to them“ selves, about fourscore shillings to their master, the said tenant,” in whose hands I have seen of the said coin. As for the house, it is, and has been for many years, an inn; so that what it was, is not clearly to be judg’d from its present outward appearance, it being much impair’d, or very coarsely repair’d, and diminish’d perhaps from what it might be when persons of distinction liv’d in it. For there is now to be seen but a narrow front, which soon coming to an angle, shoots down backwards only one range of buildings; as if another part of the front was wanting on this side, for the gateway to appear in the middle, and such another range of buildings where the new parsonage-house now stands, to make the whole uniform. However, there are within-side some handsome spacious rooms; the parlour was painted round the uppermost part of the wainscot in about a dozen pannels with scripture histories; but now so old and decay’d, as to be scarcely distinguishable. There is also a noble dining-room, the cieling whereof is all over wrought in plastic or fret-work, with representations of the Five Senses; and the chimney-piece, with the Three principal Christian Virtues. But the arms in the window, as well as in that of the hall, are by the present inhabitants erroneously call’d Sir Walter Raleigh’s;
 there being a date under one of the coats, which shews it was aneal’d six years after his death.
 So that we are not sure the decorations aforesaid were done by his direction, or that others more rich and elegant were not in their stead before them. As for his dwellings in London, we have read before that he had apartments in the court at Somerset-house, and shall read hereafter of some acquaintance resorting to him at Durham-house in the Strand: that he had a house by the Thames-side, which might be the same; and another at St. James’s, or apartments also in the court there; but to be distinct and particular in these, would be a task perhaps more difficult than profitable to attempt.

THE truth is, Sir Walter Raleigh did not live so long at court, and so much about the dazling beauties in it, without having the wings of his glory, at last, somewhat findg’d in the flames thereof: yet love, which in some other great courtiers of those times, was the grand business of their life, seemed only an interlude in his. And tho’ a gratification of this passion is usually thought lighter of in martial men, and those embarrass’d with the weight of public action, as a convenient relaxation of their cares, or reward of their toils and perils; yet a more severe construction was made of a little indulgence Raleigh might about this time take of that kind, than was in some others, who more frequently and notoriously made a practice thereof.
 Whether it was that his greater merits, in other parts of his conduct, made malice more poinant in this; or that little failings are not thought such in those where we commonly see, and therefore constantly expect, great virtues; whereby men of superior qualifications undergo greater discredit than their inferiors for the same misdeeds; as any disproportion or disfigurement in a statue of gold or alabaster gives us more displeasure than one in stone or common clay; and we look with regret upon the flaws in a diamond, while even greater in the flint do not affect us: but this seems to have been Raleigh’s case. For there was among the queen’s maids of honour a beautiful young lady (as her picture represents her) named Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, an able statesman and ambassador, whose negotiations and character are recorded both by the French and Scotch, as well as English historians of those times.
 With this lady, Raleigh had it seems an amour; and, as he was a man of nervous address, won her heart even to the last favour (if we may use the phrase of a polite author) inclusive. This intimacy came at last to the queen’s knowledge; whether enviously betray’d by any female confidant, as some might apprehend, from a character Raleigh would bestow upon the ladies of the privy-chamber and bed-chamber; being wont to say, They were like witches who could do hurt, but could do no good:<sup>d</sup> or whether the intrigue could not be long conceal’d for the fruits of it, as some, who manifestly slander Raleigh in other particulars, have not scrupled to suggest, the reader has it in his choice to believe. But in such colours this matter of devirginating a maid of honour was heighten’d, that Raleigh was out of favour again; also in confinement for several months; and when enlarg’d, forbidden the court;<sup>e</sup> whence the lady also was dismiss’d from her attendance. Yet, as heinous as this misdemeanor was in Raleigh, her majesty did not punish it in Leicester, Essex, and other courtiers, noted in their days for such intrigues; especially the former, who turn'd off Douglas Sheffield, by whom he had a son, to marry the earl of Essex's mother. But Raleigh very readily made the most honourable reparation he could, and cemented this flaw in their conduct, by marrying the object of his affection. It appears they lived together ever after in the most exemplary degree of conjugal harmony; and when he was in his greatest troubles, there are testimonies from one, who was otherwise none of his greatest friends, of her extraordinary diligence and fidelity in making interest and applications to assuage them.<sup>a</sup> What his thoughts were of a married life, in comparison with a single one, may somewhat appear in that observation he made upon a certain nobleman's growing plump after matrimony, who was meagre before; for another person in company remarking thereupon, that it fared with him contrary to what it did with other married men, who usually at first became lean after it; Raleigh very pleasantly obviated the rarity, by saying, Why there is no beast, that, if you take him from the common, and put him into the severall, but he will grow fat.<sup>b</sup> Many years afterwards, when Raleigh wrote his instructions to his son, he sufficiently explained this sentiment in the grave and paternal manner he is then writing, among others there laid down for his conduct in the choice of a wife; which topic he concludes, with advising him "to bestow his youth so, that he may have comfort to remember it when it has forsaken him." And further, amongst the judicious precepts he there gives, one of them is; "That his son would evermore care to be beloved by his wife, than be besotted on her." That in regard to the alterations of youthful affection, "If he cannot forbear to love, yet forbear to link." However, approves of a mature and settled choice at last, even while he is upon the stage of his virility. "For, believe it, the young wife betrayeth the old husband; and she that had thee not in thy flower, will despise thee in thy fall." But not to marry for beauty only; "lest thou bind thy self for life, to that which perchance will never last or please one year." Nor yet an uncomely woman; "as much regard being due at least to our own issue as to any other race of creatures; and comeliness in children is riches, if nothing else be left them. He remains perhaps pretty safe in this opinion from many censures by the hard-favour'd part of the sex, because he knew that few ladies would be positive upon this head in their right to reprove him; nor will widows believe he has treated them with rigor, while they remain in that state, since he has said, "Leave not thy wife to be a shame unto thee after thou art dead; but that she may live according to thy estate; especially if thou hast few children, and those provided for." Tho' he does also further say, "Leave her no more than of necessity thou must, but only during her widowhood; for if she love again, let her not enjoy her second love in the same bed wherein she loved thee; nor fly to future pleasures with those feathers which death hath pulled from thy wings."<sup>c</sup> Not that he was averse to second marriages, for he advised his own wife to marry again when he was in expectation of being suddenly divided for ever from her.<sup>d</sup> Many other weighty admonitions may be found relating to that sex among his writings, some of which we meet with, quoted by our most accomplish'd humanists and critics in the manners and passions of life, as from an author who had read their hearts through all their veils and disguises: but one of those writers, tho' he allows him all the advantageous views of life through such a variety of scenes; as "having lived in courts and camps; travell'd through many countries; seen many men under several climates, and of as various complexions;" yet thinks (in which every body will not agree) he speaks of our impotence to resist the wiles of women, in very severe terms;<sup>e</sup> where Raleigh has upon the solid ground of the greatest examples admonished us, to what fatal inconveniences mankind is allur'd by their restless curiosity of knowing what is unfit for their knowledge, and the prevailing expedients to gratify it of dissimulate sorrow and unquietness.<sup>f</sup>

WHILE Raleigh was under the displeasure aforesaid, and in retirement, he projected a further removal from the court; the better by that distance, and some memorable exploit, to allay the malice of his enemies, and recover his sovereign's love. Some thought this an impolitic course; as if his foreign actions could not work so effectually to his advantage, as the applications of his adversaries to his disparagement.<sup>g</sup> And hereupon Sir Robert Naunton says, "That finding his favour declining, and falling into a recess, he undertook a new peregrination to leave

“ that Terra infirma of the court, for that of the wars, and by declining himself, and by ab-“ fence to expel his and the passion of his enemies ; which in court (says he) was a strange “ device of recovery ; but that he knew there was some ill office done him, that he durst not “ attempt to mind any other ways than by going aside, thereby to teach envy a new way of “ forgetfulness, and not so much as to think of him : howsoever, he had it always in mind ne“ ver to forget himself ; and his device took so well, that at his return he came in, as rams do
 “ by going backwards, with the greater strength ; and so continued to the last great in her “ grace.”<sup>a</sup> Thus also says another author, “ His enemies of greater rank kept him under ;
 “ sometimes in, sometimes out ; and then he would wisely decline himself out of the court-road :
 “ and then you found him not but by fame ; in voyages to the West-Indies, Guiana, New Plan- “ tations, Virginia, or in some expeditions against the Spaniard.”<sup>b</sup> And thus writes a third to the same purpose : “ ’Tis observable, that Sir Walter Raleigh was in and out at court so “ often, that he was commonly call’d the Tennis-Ball of Fortune which she delighted to sport “ with. His enemies perpetually brought him into disgrace with his mistress, and his merit in “ a little time restor’d him again to her favour : and as she always grew cold to the earl of “ Essex after absence ; so she ever receiv’d Raleigh with greater marks of her esteem ; and he “ was too hard for his rivals by the very means which they intended for his destruction.”<sup>c</sup> Certainly he deserved such good fortune, beyond all others, of a restitution to royal favour, who could so much more hazardously and heroically than any of them aspire to earn it ; as now he abundantly manifested, in that grand and gallant undertaking to discover and conquer the large, rich, and beautiful empire of Guiana ; an enterprize which had baffled the repeated efforts of some of the ablest and most renowned captains and cavaliers in Spain for near a hundred years past : for, in one of their own authors, we may read the names of many brave commanders, and their commendations for the miseries they endur’d, who within that space had trod this maze, and lost themselves, with some, five hundred, some a thousand men apiece, in finding out this country.<sup>d</sup> And yet none of all their own authors have more nobly and liberally celebrated these, and other such like adventurers of the Spanish nation, than Raleigh himself has done.<sup>e</sup> How justly therefore his painful and perilous enterprize for the same discovery, will entitle him to praises equal with the most worthy of them, may soon appear, now that we are lanching forth into the spacious and meandrous channels thereof.

FOR Raleigh, industrious in diving into the causes of so many failures, having inform’d himself what ambient courses the preceding adventurers had taken to arrive at the heart of the country they sought, and which was the shortest way to make a successful discovery, found that most of the Spanish attempts in these parts had fail’d, through the mutinies and discords which they had fomented among themselves ; as most of their conquests in others, were much owing to the like factions among the Americans : and if “ there was not an expert soldier or seaman “ but he consulted (as one author observes upon his character in general) nor a printed or “ manuscript discourse but he perused ; whereby it came to pass, there were not exacter rules “ or principles for both services then he drew :”<sup>f</sup> much more may we believe he now particularly made use of these helps and lights to draw those rules and directions by which this year (last mention’d, 1594) he gave to an old officer, captain Whiddon, whose experience he had before try’d, for a voyage to the country aforesaid : and this same year that captain also return’d from thence, with several inducing confirmations of the grandeur and opulency of Guiana, having learnt the same from some of the grand casiques, or principal rulers, upon the borders thereof ;
 but not without complaints of some barbarous treachery from the Spanish governor, who had then got some footing there ; and, after promises of suffering the Englishmen to furnish themselves with what supplies they wanted, decoy’d several of them to their destruction. Raleigh tempts upon Guiana, as any one may perceive who has read Castellano’s Elegies, just before quoted, where he says, “ Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient virtue of “ the Spaniards. We seldom or never find that any na“ tion hath endured so many misadventures and miseries as “ the Spaniards have done in their Indian Discoveries ; yet “ persisting in their enterprizes with an invincible constancy, “ they have annexed to their kingdoms so many goodly “ provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers past.

 “ Tempests, shipwreck, famine, overthrows, mutinies, heat
 “ and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old “ and new ; together with extreme poverty and want of “ all things needful, have been the enemies wherewith “ every one of their most noble discoverers, at one time or “ other, hath encounter’d. Many years have passed over “ some of their heads in the search of not so many leagues ; “ yea, more than one or two have spent their labour, their “ wealth, and their lives, in search of a golden kingdom, “ without getting further notice of it, than what they had

 “ at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding,
 “ the third, fourth, and fifth, have not been dishearten’d.

had thus more spurs than one, inciting him to visit these regions in person ; and the scheme he form'd upon an answerable return, might, according to the probability of his own propositions, which will not be pass'd over, being founded upon the testimonies of the best inform'd writers, and intelligence of travellers into the country, have subjugated not only the Spanish West-Indies, but Spain it self, to the crown of England : for if we could but compass golden territories in America, as the Spaniards had done, he doubted not to extend the empire of his royal mistress as far beyond the dominion of other European princes, as she surpass'd them in her magnanimous virtues. And now this golden country made such invitations, being then no less, if not more confidently describ'd and attested for such, than any other in those parts of the world,<sup>a</sup> at least before they were perfectly discover'd ; he cheerfully determin'd, in quest thereof, tho' through an ocean of difficulties, to wash away the malice of his adversaries at court, and render his character more impenetrable against the little censures which swarm in that theatre of circumvention to sting and fester superior merit : as if he thought no foreign expedition could be more hazardous to the brave, or such as cannot live without distinguishing themselves, than the busy factions and parties which are daily undermining them at home ; but that, like Chabrias, and others of the greatest Athenians in his time, he should be remov'd from envy, as far as he was distant from his native country. With such like views Raleigh very speedily fitted out a fleet, and at a great expence ; tho' the lord admiral Howard and Sir Robert Cecyl were at the further charge of augmenting it ; such opinion they also had of this enterprise. We may distinguish five ships under him, besides barges, wherries, and other necessary tenders, in his own excellent narrative of this voyage, tho' he names them not at first setting out ; because he seems not to have been then accompanied with more than one of them : but, as they afterwards join'd him, he mentions them. Whence we understand, the ship himself went in was his own, which he does not name ; but the Lion's Whelp, which was the lord-admiral's, was commanded by captain George Gifford ; captain Keymis had the command of a galego, besides a bark, which was committed to captain Cross, and another to captain Calfield. The whole number of men in this fleet is not mention'd ; but the select company of officers, gentlemen and soldiers, he us'd in his discoveries, exceeded not one hundred. Thus prepar'd, he departed from Plymouth on the sixth of February following, and made to the Grand Canaries, and so to Tenerif, where he waited a-while for the Lion's Whelp, and for captain Amias Preston. But this captain disappointed him, and went upon another adventure, which proved some disadvantage in the prosecution of his discoveries. After seven or eight days, not seeing them, he proceeded for Trinidad with his own ship and captain Cross's only (for the galego which set out with them linger'd behind on the coast of Spain) They reach'd that isle on the 22d of March, and cast anchor at Point Curriapan, which the Spaniards call'd Punta de Gallo, situate in eight degrees or thereabouts. In the four or five days he continued here, he came not to the speech of any Indian or Spaniard. On the coast he saw a fire, but for fear of the Spaniards none of the Indians dared to approach him. Then Raleigh, in his barge, coasted close along the shore, and landed in every cove, the better to know the island, while his ships kept the channel. From hence he remov'd in a few days up north-east, to recover that place the Spaniards call Puerto de los Espannoles, but the inhabitants Conquerabia ; and as before (revictualling his barge) he left the ships, and kept by the shore, that he might better speak with the inhabitants, and observe the rivers, watering-places, and ports in the island ; of all which he took draughts as he pass'd along, which he re-

stance of which report is at the end of the navigation of the great river of Marannon, written by Gonzalo Fernando de Oviedo to cardinal Bembo, and printed in the Raccolta delle Navigazioni, &c. da Giovanni Battista Ramusio, vol. 3. fol. 416. We may read also in Martin Fernandez de Encica's discourse of the ports, creeks, and havens of the West-Indies, dedicated to Charles the emperor Ann. 1518. in Lopez Vaz, and several other authors, repeated assurances of the mountains and rivers in this country abounding with gold. And this very year, that Raleigh sent for intelligence thither, there were Spanish letters taken at sea by captain Popham (who laid them before the council) wherein were many testimonies of gold and jewels found there in vast plenty ; and a great idol weighing forty-seven quintals, with a bark brought from thence to Madera, containing two millions of gold. Confirming also the natives besprinkling themselves over with the powder of gold when they enter'd their Borracheras or Bacchanalian feasts, which the honourable Mr. Rob. Duddely, in his voyage to the isle of Trinidad, also mentions. See Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 634, 699, 778, 576, &c.

duced at last to one general map. At Parico he found a fresh-water river, and at Terra de Brea, another port, call'd by the natives Piche, great quantities of very good oysters growing upon the branches of certain trees, here so numerous, that he travell'd for a dozen miles together under them ; which enabled him afterwards to rectify the ancient accounts of this tree, and the fond conceits of some moderns, that it was the tree of knowledge.<sup>a</sup> In short, he coasted three parts of the isle of Trinidad, in the month he staid there for captain Preston, the more exactly to make his draught thereof afore said.<sup>b</sup> At Puerto de los Espannoles he met with his ships, and found a company of Spaniards keeping guard at the descent, who, in doubt of their own strength,<sup>c</sup> offer'd signs of peace. He sent captain Whiddon to parley with them, whom he afterwards left buried in the island to his great grief, being a man, says Raleigh, most honest and valiant. From some of the Spanish soldiers, whom he found means to make free of their tongue by the help of wine ; and from one of the Indian rulers, named Cantyman, whom captain Whiddon had been acquainted with, he gather'd what strength the Spaniards were of, and how far it was to the city they had built under their governor Don Antonio de Berreo. Here he found occasion of staying a-while ; both to have some reckoning with Berreo for his treacherous dealings with the English under Whiddon ; and to learn also the strength, riches, and passages to several other parts of the country. But when Raleigh was credibly inform'd that the Spanish governor had sent for a recruit of soldiers, and how lamentably the natives suffer'd under his cruelties ; that the very lords of the country were made his slaves ; that he had put one of them, named Morequito, to death ; that several others were then lying in chains, and languishing under the most exquisite tortures, he found sufficient occasion not only to revenge the loss of his countrymen, but a good opportunity to gain the hearts of the Indians, by attempting to rescue them from this yoke of tyranny : and indeed without this attempt, in vain had any other been towards his intended discoveries. For, considering he was to enter Guiana in small boats, and to leave his ships some hundred miles behind, he was not unapprehensive how indiscreet he should be thought by all men, if he left also a garrison of enemies at his back, interested in the same enterprize, and in daily expectation of reinforcements from Spain : therefore, taking his advantage, he boldly set upon the Corps du Garde in the dusk of the evening ; and having put them to the sword, advanced with a hundred men, and by brake of day took their new city call'd San Joseph, which, at the entreaty of the Indians, he set on fire. Then were the natives in confinement, set at liberty. Among them were five Casiques, or petty kings in those parts.<sup>d</sup> These, all bound together in one chain, almost dead with famine, and wasted with torments ; having had their naked bodies basted or dropp'd over with burning bacon ; Raleigh also, to his great reputation, deliver'd from their captivity ; and several years after, when this, with Raleigh's other noble acts among these Indians, was mention'd by some of our English adventurers to Guiana, it was freshly retain'd and gratefully acknowledged by them to his honour ; when also one of their bravest princes, who had been in England, and christen'd Leonard Ragapo, came above a hundred miles to visit them, for the great love he bore to Raleigh ; manifestly shewing, how durably he had engag'd their affection and desires for his return to be their ruler and protector.<sup>e</sup> But for the governor, who had imprison'd so many of them, he was now become a prisoner himself ; and Raleigh, by his courteous treatment of him, reaped the fruit of that knowledge and experience he had gather'd in the many years he had consum'd, with great sums of money, upon the discovery of Guiana.<sup>f</sup> The same day that Raleigh made this conquest, arrived captain Gifford and captain Keymis, and in their ships divers gentlemen and others, which to his little army was a great succour and <sup>b</sup> Martin Fernandez de Encica, before quoted, says this island of Trinidad is twenty-five leagues in length, and as many in breadth ; but Raleigh, who knew it much better, says it is but narrow, and in the form of a sheep-hook ; that the north part is mountainous ; the soil excellent, and will bear sugar, ginger, or any other commodities the Indies yield ; has store of deer, wild porks, fruits, fish, and fowl. Mr. Dudley, in his voyage thither before-mention'd, call'd the bay under the point of Curiapam, Pelicans Bay, from the abundance of those birds there ; says they had also parrots in great number and variety ; and, according to Sir Walter Raleigh's account, divers beasts which the Indies have not, who adds, the Spaniards confess'd they had found grains of gold in some of the rivers ; but he carried not in search thereof, through his desire of entering Guiana.

<sup>c</sup> And yet the Spaniards had now gotten some three hundred soldiers there, as Mr. Dudley, in his voyage above-cited, informs us, which was the reason he could not attempt to displant them. Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 575.

solace. Then proceeding upon his discovery, Raleigh first call'd all the chiefs of the island together, who were enemies to the Spaniards; for some of them Berreco had brought out of other countries, and planted there, to eat out and waste the natives; then by his Indian interpreter, whom he carried out of England, he made them understand “he was the servant of a queen, who was the greatest Casique of the north, and a virgin, who had more Casiqui under her than there were trees in that island: that she was an enemy to the Castellani, in regard of their tyranny and oppression; and having freed all the coasts of the northern world from their servitude, had sent him to free them also; and withal to defend the country of Guiana from their invasion and conquest.” Then he shew'd them her majesty's picture, which they so admir'd and honour'd, that it had been easy for him to have made them idolatrous thereof. The like and larger speeches he made in solemn manner to the rest of the nations, both in his passage to Guiana and to those of the borders: so as in that part of the world the queen of England's fame was diffus'd with great admiration. This done, Raleigh return'd to Curiapan, and tho' he had learnt of Berreco, that Guiana was some hundred miles further than the accounts he receiv'd of captain Whiddon had represented it, he kept the knowledge thereof from his company, whom he fear'd would have been discourag'd thereby from prosecuting the discovery. When Raleigh had further gather'd from Berreco the proceedings of the past adventurers and his own, of all which he gives us a succinct and curious history, he told him he was come upon the same design, and was resolv'd to see Guiana. Berreco used many arguments to dissuade him; as that he must venture in very light and small boats to pass so many dangerous shallows, and could not carry victuals enough above half the way; that none of the country would speak with him; and, if he followed them, would burn their towns; besides, the way was long, the winter at hand, and the rivers beginning to swell; but above all, that the kings and lords, who bordered upon Guiana, had decreed, that none of them should trade with any Christians for gold, because the same would be their own overthrow. Raleigh, resolving however to make trial, directed his vice-admiral, captain Gifford, and captain Calfield, to turn eastward against the mouth of the river Capuri, and gave them instructions to anchor at the edge of the shoal, and upon the best of the flood to thrust over; but they labour'd in vain: nor did the flood continue so long, but the water fell before they could have passed the sands. Then Raleigh sent one King, master of the Lion's Whelp, to try another branch, called the Amana, if either of the small ships would enter; but when he came to the mouth, he found it as the rest. After him went John Dowglass, who discover'd four goodly entrances; but all shoal'd and shallow in the bays leading to them. In the mean time Raleigh, fearing the worst, caused his carpenters to cut down an old galego boat, to fit her with banks for oars, and so as she might draw but five foot; in this went Raleigh, with gentlemen and officers to the number of threescore. In the Lion's Whelp boat and wherry they carried twenty; captain Calfield, in his wherry, carried ten; and a barge of Raleigh's ten more. This was all the means they had, having left their ships at Curiapan, to carry a hundred men, with weapons and provisions for a month, exposed to all the extremes of the weather, all the hazards of the water; to lie open to the air, and upon hard boards by night; in storms of rain, or under the burning sun by day; to smell the wet cloaths of so many crowded together; the dressing of their food, and that mostly stale fish, in the same place; to be in such a labyrinth of rivers, in such a remote and unknown region; what prison could be more loathsome and unhealthy? what prospect more fearful and desolate? At first setting out, they had twenty miles of a high sea to cross in these scanty boats; so that they were driven before the wind into the bottom of the bay of Guanipa, inhabited by inhuman cannibals, who shot poison'd arrows: and from thence to enter one of the rivers of which Dowglass had brought tidings. After four days, they were past ebbing and flowing, and might have wander'd a whole year about, and never been able to extricate themselves, in such a general confluence or rendezvous of streams were they now bewilder'd; and so resembling one another, as not to be distinguish'd; but imperceptibly circulating and driving them about into the same places where they had been before; passing between many islands and streights, whose borders were so thickly arch'd and over-shadowed with trees, as bounded their sight to the breadth of the river and length of the avenue, while the gloominess of the prospect added horror to the loneliness of the place. At length, on the 22d of May 1595, they fell into a river; which, because it had no name, they call'd the Red-cross River, these being the first Christians who ever enter'd the same. When they drew into the creek, which led to a town upon this river, their Indian pilot, named Ferdinando, landing, was set upon by his countrymen, who hunted him with dogs; whereupon Raleigh seiz'd an old man passing that way, and threaten'd to cut off his head if he would not procure his pilot's liberty: but he, by his agility, soon escaped them, them, and swam to Raleigh's barge: however, they kept the old man, and used him kindly, assuring themselves of useful information from a native so long conversant in those parts. And indeed, but for this accident, they had never found their way forward to the country they sought, nor back to that where their ships lay; the old man himself being often in the utmost perplexity which river to take, so numerous and intricate they were. Those people who dwell in the flooded lands of this insular and broken world, or in all the tracts towards Guiana, which the eight branches of the Orenoque fashion into islands, are generally called Tivitivas, but distinguished into two tribes, a hardy and valiant generation; who, though they inhabited houses on the ground in summer, yet in winter were forced to ascend and reside in the trees, where they built themselves artificial towns, and whole families were to be seen lodg'd in an arm or branch of those aerial or vegetable tenements; as, it is written in the Spanish history of the West-Indies, those people also did in the low-lands, near the gulph of Uraba; for between May and September those islands are over-flow'd in some places twenty foot high by the said grand river of Orenoque.

DEPARTING from this quarter of the Tivitivas, which was under the division or tribe call'd Ciarwani, he kept passing up the river with the flood, and anchoring in the ebb; yet the third day of his entering the river aforesaid his galley ran a-ground, and stuck so fast, they all thought their discovery was at an end, and that the greatest number of them must live like rooks, and build their nests in the boughs; but, after emptying her ballast, and much labour, they got her a-float at the end of the fourth day, and struck into another river call'd the Great Amana, spacious and without winding, being one of the fairest branches of the grand Orenoque: but here the flood of the sea left them, and every man, from the highest to the lowest, was forced to tug by turns at the oar for several days, against a rapid current, and in a most sultry clime; for they were now in five degrees of the line. Many goodly rivulets they pass'd on either side, which Raleigh nam'd in his map, and shewed their rise and descent. When three days more were passed over, his company began as well to despair at the length of the way, as to languish through excessive heat; and well might their courage, now their provision also began to fail; yet now had they most need of strength and vigor, when the current of the river grew most boisterous and violent against them. Here Raleigh had a great task to keep up the spirits of his disconsolate companions, which could not be done by exhortations, without example; without being ever foremost to endure labour, and the last who gratify'd himself with refreshment. He also strictly commanded his pilots to promise an end every next day; which honest deceit he used so often, they were forced to assure it would be at every reach. Thus while he was giving them hopes of attaining the land where their patience should be rewarded with plenty; while he was wringing out every man's thoughts of returning, by the strongest arguments which could be oppos'd; as that they were now got so far, and reduced to such slender accommodations, they could not avoid perishing if they return'd; but might find relief in proceeding: Providence seems to have rewarded his trust in her, by happily shifting the scene, and presenting the most beautiful landskip they had ever beheld. For here mountains, crowned with garlands of fruitful trees, invited one sense; and verdant plains of many miles extent, enamell'd with groups of odorous flowers, regal'd another. Birds of such sorts and colours as they had never seen,* tempted them to supply themselves by their fowling-pieces; and fishes of various kinds, by their nets; without which, having little or no bread, and less drink, only the thick and troubled water of the river, they had been in the greatest extremity. Now the old Ciarwanian they had taken (as before-mention'd) persuading them he would lead them to a town up the branch of a river on the right hand, where they might be supply'd with all conveniences, and return before night; Raleigh leaving his galley, took eight musketers in his barge, and with Gifford and Calfield in their wherries, having eight musketers more, enter'd the mouth of that river; but rowed till sun-set, and saw no sign of the town even till they were forty miles distant from the galley, and the rowers were ready to give up the ghost. They had certainly hang'd this pilot, but that their necessities were his security; for it was quite dark, and they knew not their way back again; but as they proceeded, the river grew so narrow, and was so over-spread with trees from side to side, that they were all forc'd with their swords to cut a way for their oars, being still in hopes of a supper that would make amends for their breakfast. About one a-clock after midnight they discern'd a light, and heard the barking of dogs; soon after they found the village, and there they were stored with provisions, according prove that the difference of colour or magnitude in many of them made not a difference of species. See his Hist. of the World, lib. 1. cap. 7. sect. 9.

to the promises of the old pilot. In the mean time, the company in the galley mann'd out a boat in search of them ; but next day they return'd, and continu'd their course, after they had made this hungry and hazardous voyage for fourscore miles in that river ; which, besides other strange fishes of marvellous bigness, abounded with those ugly serpents call'd Crocodiles ; whence the people nam'd it the river of Lagartos. Ralegh had a very proper young negro attending upon him in his galley, who, leaping out to swim in the mouth of this river, was, in the sight of them all, instantly devour'd by one of these amphibious animals. Not long after, being again in want of victuals, they took two canoes laden with excellent bread, being run ashore by the Indians in them call'd Arwacas, who fled to hide themselves in the woods ; fearing, through the prepossessions of the Spaniards, that Ralegh and his company were Canibals. Ralegh pursuing them, in hopes of some intelligence, found, as he was creeping through the bushes, a refiner's basket, there being in it quicksilver, saltpetre, and divers other materials, for the trial of metals ; and also the dust of some ore that had been refin'd : but in two other canoes which escaped them, they heard of a good quantity of ore and gold. Ralegh then landed more men, and offer'd five hundred pounds to any of his soldiers who should take one of the Spaniards, whom they thought to have also landed in these last canoes ; but they escaped while he was pursuing the former : however, while he was in search of the Spaniards, he found the Arwaca, hidden in the woods, who had been pilots for the Spaniards ; of which Ralegh kept the chief for his pilot, and carried him to Guiana ; by whom he understood in what parts the Spaniards labour'd for gold, which he divulged to few of his company, knowing both the season of the year and other conveniences would be wanting to work any mine himself. Therefore he hasted away from this place, his purpose being at that time rather to discover what he could of the country, and win over the people to subjection. Here Ralegh's own words are : “ To stay “ and dig out gold with our nails, had been opus laboris, but not ingenii. Such a quantity as “ would have served our turns we could not have had ; but a discovery of the mines to our “ infinite disadvantage we had made ; for those mines (defended with rocks of hard stone, which “ we call white spar) are not easily broken or open'd in haste ; and I could have return'd a good
“ quantity of gold ready cast, if I had not shot at another mark than present profit.” Besides this restraint from all greediness after their gold, there was another virtue he no less strictly observ'd, which highly advanced him in the esteem of all those Indians. For, whereas the Spaniards were wont to satisfy their lusts without controul upon their wives and daughters, Ralegh suffer'd not a man of his so much as to touch any of their women. “ I protest (says he) before the majesty of the living God, that I neither knew, nor believe that any of our company, one or other, by violence or otherwise, ever knew any of their women ; and yet we saw many hundreds, and had many in our power, and of those very young and excellently favour'd, which came among us without deceit, stark naked.” And because he found it a very troublesome work to keep the meaner sort from pilfering and spoil, when they went to any of the Indians houses, Ralegh caused his interpreter at every place, when they departed, to enquire after, and know the losses or wrongs that had been done ; and if he found any thing had been stolen or taken by violence, either the same was restor'd, and the party punish'd in their fight, or else it was paid for to their utmost demand. In the river of Crocodiles.

AFTER he was recruited as aforesaid with bread and other provisions, which greatly encourag'd his men, who now cry'd out, Let us go on, we care not how far ; Ralegh sent back in one of the canoes the old Ciawan, and Ferdinando, his first pilot ; giving them such things as they desir'd for their voyage, and wrote a letter to his ships, which they deliver'd, and then he went on under the pilotage of one of those Arwacas he had taken, whom the Spaniards had christen'd Martin. But the next or second day after, they run a-ground again with their galley, and she was very near being cast away with their new store of victuals : they lay on the sand one whole night, and were in far greater despair of disengaging her than before, because they had no tide of flood to help them. In the midst of their fears, they bethought them of fastening an anchor upon the land, and with main strength drew her off. So the fifteenth day (of their absence from their ships) they discover'd at a distance, to their great joy, the mountains of Guiana ; and towards the evening were brought by a northerly gale in sight of the great Orenoque,• which they soon after enter'd ; a river of vast extent and magnitude, lying mostly east and west even from the sea to Quito in Peru, thought to be three hundred miles wide at the mouth, a thousand miles navigable for ships, two thousand for lesser vessels, and discharging it felt by sixteen arms into the sea, whereby many parts of the Spanish Indies might most easily His continence.

be invaded. From other observations, it appears in many places of the channel to be twenty fathom deep; and in few that are shoally, less than two and a half. It was called by the succeeding voyagers to this place, in honour of Sir Walter, after his name. One of them gives his reason for it in these words: "Of the worthiness of this river because I cannot say enough; " I will speak nothing; we have presumed to call it by the name of RALEANA, because your self " was the first of our nation who ever enter'd the same.<sup>a</sup> Now when Ralegh had procur'd of one of the bordering princes, named Toparimaca, a skilful old pilot, who was his brother, and who perfectly knew this river, he sail'd up a branch thereof, having on the left hand a great island which they call Affapana; and thence along the banks of several other islands, which they chose rather to anchor at than by the main land, because of the tortoises eggs, which they found there in abundance, to their great relief; and for the convenience of casting their nets from the rocks, of a blue metalline colour, which looked like steel ore. So keeping always westward up the river, there open'd after a while a land on the right side, which appear'd a spacious champain, and the banks perfectly red. Ralegh sent captain Gifford, Thynn, Calfield, his cousins Grenvill and Butthead Gorges; also his nephew John Gilbert and some others, with a guard of soldiers, to march over the banks, and discover what prospect it afforded; and finding it a level of an unbounded space, it proved, as their pilot inform'd them, the plains of Saima, reaching to Cumana and Caracas in the West-Indies, which are a hundred and twenty leagues to the north, and inhabited by four principal nations, whereof one were the Aroras, as black as negroes, but of smooth hair; a desperate people, using the strongest and most deadly poison of all others on their arrows. Ralegh was most curious to know the composition of this poison, and what remedies could be had against the dreadful effects of it. For, besides the mortality of the wound, the patient is afflicted with most insufferable torment, and accompanied with such irksome symptoms, that the physician cannot abide the cure. None of the Spaniards could ever extort this secret either by kindness or cruelty; and indeed but few of the Indians, besides their priests and soothsayers, knew it.<sup>b</sup> Ralegh was therefore more beholden to the Guianians than any body; for Antonio de Berrio told him, that he could never attain to the knowledge thereof. " And yet they taught me (says Ralegh) the best way of healing as well " this, as all other poisons." Then he tells us those medicines which are vulgar, and serve for the ordinary poison, are made of the juice of a root call'd Tupara,<sup>c</sup> which also marvellously quenches the heat of burning fevers, and heals inward wounds; and that those of common poison'd arrows were wont to be heal'd by some of the Spaniards with the juice of garlic. But this he communicates as a general rule for all men that shall hereafter travel the Indies where poison'd arrows are used, that they abstain from drink; for if they take any liquor into their body, whereunto they will be exceedingly provok'd by drought, and drink before the wound is dress'd, or immediately upon it, there is no relief but present death.

His skill in the cure of poisons.

AFTER having pass'd the mountain Aio, and a great island, which he mentions, he reach'd on the fifth day of his entering the great river aforesaid, as high as the province of Aromaia, and anchoring at the port of Morequito, which is some three hundred miles within the land, upon the said great river Orenoque, he sent a messenger to the old king of Aromaia, named Topiowary, who came the next day before noon on foot from his house, and return'd the same evening, being twenty-eight miles backwards and forwards, tho' himself was one hundred and ten years of age. He had many attendants of both sexes, who came also to wonder at the English, and brought them great plenty of flesh, fowl and fish, with divers sorts of fruits, and among them abundance of pinas, the most excellent of all kinds,<sup>d</sup> especially those of Guiana;

<sup>b</sup> Whether the poison they used in Guiana was the same with that in some other parts of the West-Indies, Ralegh has not told us; but Sir John Hawkins informs us, that about Cumana, where they are very expert archers, " their " poison is of such force, that a man being struck there- " with, dies in twenty-four hours: and, that in his judg- " ment, there can be no stronger; using thereunto apples, " which are fair and red of colour; but are a strong poi- " son (perhaps the Manchineil) of which with venomous " bats, vipers, adders, and other serpents, they make a " medley, and anoint their arrows." See Hawkins's voyage to Guinea and the Indies of Nova Hispania, in Hakluyt, vol. 3. fol. 508.

<sup>d</sup> Whether Ralegh, at his return, brought of this fruit into England, which is otherwise call'd the Ananas, and vulgarly the pine-apple, from some resemblance it bears in shape to the cones of the pine-tree; or any of that most delicious wine made thereof, which he there also tasted, has rather been suggested than confirm'd; but afterwards, when, a speedy voyage, some of the fruit was brought over and by presented to king James, in greater perfection than we can conceive from tasting what is forced out of hot beds here, he discover'd one of the noble maxims in his king-craft, by declaring, It was a fruit too delicious, for a subject to taste of. See a book call'd, Advice to the planters of both Indies, 8vo. without date. But had he known the profuseness which the English have since been at to eat them, how imperfectly soever, of their own raising, he might perhaps have more justly said, It was a fruit too extravagant, for a subject to taste of.

besides bread, wine, and a sort of parroquites no bigger than wrens. And one of them presented Ralegh with a little beast, which the Spaniards call Armadilla, having his body scal'd or plated over like the Rhinoceros, with a white horn growing in his hinder parts as big as a hunting horn. This horn is recommended in medicine,<sup>a</sup> and the flesh for food, since Ralegh soon after made a feast of it.

WHEN the old king had rested himself a while in a tent which Ralegh had caused to be pitch'd for him, they enter'd, by the interpreter, into discourse about the murder of Morequito, his predecessor, and the other violations of the Spaniards. Then Ralegh acquainted him with the cause of his coming thither, whose servant he was, and that it was his queen's pleasure he should undertake this voyage for their defence, and to deliver them from the tyranny of the Spaniards; dilating at large (as he had done before at Trinidad) on her majesty's power, her justice, and her clemency towards all oppressed nations: all which, being with great reverence and attention receiv'd, he began to sound the old man touching Guiana; as what sort of commonwealth it was, how govern'd, of what strength and policy, of what extent; with whom in alliance or enmity; lastly, the distance and way to enter the heart of the country? The king gave such ample and perfect account of these particulars, that Ralegh wonder'd to find a man of such gravity, judgment, and good discourse, without the help of learning or breeding. After his departure, Ralegh sail'd westward to view the famous river Caroli, both because it was so wonderful in it self, and led to the strongest nations of all the frontiers, who were enemies to the Epuremei, subjects to the Inga, or emperor of Guiana and Manoa. Even when he was short of it, or lower down than the port of Morequito, he heard the roaring falls of this river; but when he enter'd it with his barge and wherries, thinking to have gone up some forty miles to the Cassipagotos, he was not able with a barge of eight oars to row one stone's throw in an hour; and yet the river is as broad as the Thames at Woolwich. Therefore encamping on the banks, he sent off an Indian to acquaint the nations upon the river of his arrival, and his purpose; and that he desir'd to see the lords of Canuria, who dwelt in that province. Then one of the princes came down, named Wanuretona, with many of his people, and brought great store of provisions, as the rest had done. By him Ralegh found, the Carolians were not only enemies to the Spaniards, but most of all to the Epuremei, who abounded in gold; and that there were three mighty nations at the head of that river which would join him against them. He was further inform'd by one captain George, whom he had taken with Berreio, that near the banks of this river there was a great silver mine; but the rivers were all now so risen, that it was not possible for the strength of man with any boat to row against the stream. Therefore he dispatched a party between thirty and forty to coast the river by land, while himself, with two or three officers and half a dozen shot, marched over-land to view the strange and wonderful overfalls of the said river Caroli, which roar'd at such a distance, and the plains adjoining, with the rest of the province of Canuri. When they had got to the top of the first hills over-looking the river, they beheld that prodigious breach of waters which pour'd down Caroli, and how it ran in three streams for twenty miles together. No less than ten or a dozen of these steep cataracts appear'd in sight, each as high above the other as a church-tower; which rush'd down with such violence, that the very rebound of the waters made the place seem as if it had been all over cover'd with a great shower of rain; and in some places they took it at first for a thick smoke which had risen out of some great town, till they drew nearer down in the valley to this thunder of waters, where they better discern'd and distinguish'd the effects of it. And here Ralegh says, he never saw a more beautiful country, nor more lively prospects; the hills so raised up and down about the valleys; the waters winding into such various branches; the plains so clear of bush and stubble, and cover'd all with fair green grass; the ground of hard sand, and easy for the march either of horse or foot; the deer crossing in every path; the birds, towards the evening, singing on every tree a thousand several tunes, with cranes and herons of white, crimson and carnation, perched along the river banks; the air refresh'd with gentle easterly breezes; and every stone they stoop'd to take up, promising either gold or silver by its complexion. His company, at their return, brought several of these stones home; which they rather found colour'd outwardly like gold, than any of that metal fixed in them; for those who had least judgment or experience, kept only such as glitter'd, and would not be persuad'd but they were rich, because they shone, thereby bred an opinion, that all the rest were no better. Yet some of these stones Ralegh shewed afterwards to a Spaniard of the Caracas, who told him it was El madre del oro, that is, the mother of gold; and that the mine was further in the ground.

His report of the Ewaipanoma.

AMONG the goodly rivers beyond the Caroli, there is one named Caora. Upon this branch, it was attested to Ralegh by the most intelligent and credible chiefs of the adjacent parts, there dwelt a nation of people whose heads appear not above their shoulders; which, because every body in the provinces of Aromaia and Canuri also affirm'd, he was inclin'd to believe. They are call'd Ewaipanoma, and reported to have their eyes in their shoulders, and mouths in their breasts (or in a level with them.) It was further avouch'd to him, they used bows, arrows, and clubs thrice as big as any of the Guianians; and that one being taken prisoner the year before, was brought into Aromaia. When Ralegh doubted of such a race to the prince, hereafter mention'd, who came with him into England, he answer'd, it was no wonder among them; for they had lately slain many hundreds of his father's people. Ralegh observes, "That Mandevill had before written of such a nation;" and that, since the East-Indian discoveries, we find "many of his relations true, which were before held incredible." Further, that when he afterwards arriv'd at Cumana, he spoke with a Spaniard eminent for his travels, and withal for his credit and veracity; who, hearing that Ralegh had been as far in Guiana as Caroli, immediately ask'd him if he had seen those people, and declar'd he had seen many of them. Then Ralegh names some French merchants of London, who were there present, and heard what this Spaniard had thus asserted. "Whether it is true or no (says he) the matter is not great, neither can there be any profit in the imagination; for my own part, I saw them not; but am resolv'd, that so many people did not all combine or fore-think to make the report." After all, whether the observation of any garment loosely rising above the shoulders of these people, or the crouching posture in which they were so much seen, by their constant exercise of archery, might not first give some rise to this report, I leave for others more largely to explain; and how far the same person should here be condemn'd for an implicit faith, who was, as we have read, censur'd for the want of it. This consideration may be further offer'd for what Ralegh also repeats, not only from the writers of all nations, concerning the modern Amazons in these parts,<sup>c</sup> but from their very neighbours. For having told us, that Orellana first discover'd Marannon, which is call'd the river of Amazons,<sup>d</sup> and also after the said discoverers own name, Ralegh was inquisitive to know whether there were any of those warlike women, from whom this river should be so call'd, in these American parts, who are so fam'd in ancient histories to have been in Asia and Africa; and was assur'd by an ancient Casique, that there was such a nation of women on the south of the said river, in the provinces of Topago, whose manners and customs, as they describ'd to him, did somewhat conform with what is recorded of the ancient Amazons: as, that they cohabited with men but one month in the year; sent them the male children, and kept only the females; "but that they cut off their right breast (says he) I do not find to be true." He was further told, they scrupled not to accompany with the prisoners they took in war at any time; but in the end constantly put them to death: and that, as others of the bordering nations, these women wore certain plates of gold, which they had

And of the Amazons.

<sup>a</sup> Sir John Mandevill's words, according to the old Latin copy of his travels, are (speaking of some southern island:) "Alia insula habet homines aspectu deformes, nihil autem colli aut capitis ostendentes; unde & Acephali nuncupantur: oculos autem habent ante ad scapulas, & in loco pectoris os apertum, ad formam ferri quo nostri cavalli frenantur." See also the late English edition of his voyage and travel, &c. 8vo. 1727. printed from a MS. in the Cotton library three hundred years old; where it plainly appears, his description of these headless people, p. 243. is copied out of Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. 7. cap. 2. and lib. 5. cap. 8. But the notion of such a people did now so prevail, captain Keymis bringing fresh assurances of men with mouths in their breasts, exceeding wide, from Guiana the year after, that Shakespeare, in his Tempest, tells us every adventurer would now bring good warrant of them. He repeats the description again of those people; where Othello relates the wonders of his travels, to charm the attention and concern of his Desdemona: and this, as 'tis thought, in compliment to Sir Walter Ralegh's authority; for Shakespeare had certainly read his discovery of Guiana, as by other passages in his plays might be proved.

<sup>b</sup> Mr. Theobald thinks, we may be able to account, in a few lines, for the mystery of these supposed headless people: for Charlus speaking (says he) of the manner of cloathing of the Savages, a people of north Muscovy, says, "Their garments are made like those call'd Cosiques, open only at the necks. When the cold is extraordinary, they put their Cosiques over their heads, and let the "sleeves hang down, their faces being not to be seen but at the cleft, which is at the neck; whence some have taken occasion to write, that in these northern countries, there are people without heads, having their faces in their breasts." Theobald's Shakespeare, 8vo. 1733. vol. VII. p. 393.

Also Lopez Vaz, in his discourse of the West-Indies and the South-Sea; where he confirms the account of these Indian women, who fought in the wars with bows and arrows to aid their husbands, but not without them; and who, shewing themselves more valiant than their husbands, against the Spaniards, they therefore call'd the river, upon parts whereof these women dwelt, the river of Amazons.

sometimes exchange'd with other countries for spleen-stones; which are of a green colour; and whereof (says Ralegh) I saw divers in Guiana; for every king or casique commonly has one, which their wives chiefly wear, and esteem as great jewels. These strange reports, however difficultly digested by those who had only travell'd at home; which made Ralegh afterwards produce many learned authorities, both ancient and modern, to justify himself from imposing any inventions of his own;<sup>a</sup> foreigners, it seems, thought not so extravagant, being more familiar and current among them; and Hugo Grotius, intimates as if Ralegh shew'd no more regard to these accounts than any other traveller would have done; where, mentioning this his discovery of Guiana, he says, "That as to the Amazons, and those who had their faces in " their breasts, having only heard talk of them, he left it for others to find them out."<sup>b</sup> But to return:

WHILE Ralegh, with his company, lay at anchor on the coast of Canuri, and had taken knowledge of all the nations upon the head and branches of the Caroli; had found out many tribes who were enemies to the Epuremei and the new conquerors, having now sail'd and wander'd for the space of near a month, distant from his ships above four hundred miles; besides the long digressions up many arms and branches on every side by the way, they found the winter-season advance apace,<sup>c</sup> and the Orenoque threaten them with greater fury every day than other; the time they spent at Trinidad, and the company they there in vain waited for, being both wanted here to compleat their enterprize. For the most violent storms of thunder and lightning which now so frequently broke out, pour'd down such floods of rain, as made all the rivers rise and rage most fearfully; so that if they waded them over-shoos in the morning outward, homeward they could not come, even the same day, without wading to their necks, or swimming before they could reach their boats. Besides, they all grew very uneasy to themselves and one another for want of shifting, no man having room to bestow any other apparel than what he wore on his back; and that was wash'd through to his skin often ten times a day. These inconveniences, with those of having no instruments to try any mines, or men sufficient to secure them against the guarded nations nearer the imperial city of Manoa, captain Preston having fail'd them, as was before said, made Ralegh conclude there was now no advancing thither, or staying longer here; but that he might well content himself for this voyage with the various discoveries of the situation, products and riches of the country, which he had thus far made; with the interest and friendship he had thus spaciouly procur'd; and which no adventurer to those regions ever had in a much larger space of time, with much greater aids and provisions, the diligence and dexterity to equal.

As he return'd therefore to the east, he spent some time in discovering the river towards the sea which he had not survey'd, and which he thought also necessary to do. In a day's time he arriv'd again at the port of Morequito; for, gliding down the stream, he went without labour, tho' against the wind, little less than a hundred miles a day. When he came to anchor, he was very desirous of some further conference with old Topiwari, who soon, upon notice, came, with a multitude of his people, flocking down to Ralegh's tent upon the shore, every one loaded with presents. When the old king was refresh'd, and the crowd retir'd, Ralegh, by his interpreter, enter'd into a long conference with him; telling him that as both the Epuremei and the Spaniards were his enemies; the one having conquer'd Guiana already, and the other endeavour'd to get it from both, he desir'd to be instructed both in the best ways to the golden parts of Guiana, and the civiliz'd towns, or apparell'd people of Inga. The king answer'd, he could not perceive Ralegh meant to proceed to the great city of Manoa, because neither the season of the year nor the strength of his company would enable him; for he remember'd that in the plains of Maquireguarai, the first civil town of Guiana, where all the gold plates were made which were scatter'd over the neighbouring nations, and about four days journey from his own, three hundred Spaniards were destroy'd, who had no friends among the borderers; therefore advis'd Ralegh never to invade the strong parts of Guiana, without the help of all those nations which were their enemies. Ralegh ask'd, if he thought the company he had with him were sufficient to take that town: the king thought they were, and proffer'd to assist him with all his borderers, if he would leave him a guard of fifty men upon his departure; but Ra-

His last conference with the king of Aromaita.

legb knowing if they should escape the Guianians, the Spaniards expecting supplies, would repay upon them his treatment at Trinidad, very plausibly excus'd himself. Hereupon the king desir'd he would forbear him and his country at this time; for if the Epuremei should know he had given Ralegh any aid or intelligence, he should soon be over-run by them; nor could he avoid the Spaniards, if they should return, who had before led him seventeen days in a chain like a dog, till he paid a hundred plates of gold and several chains of spleen-stones for his ransom: but if Ralegh would return in due season next year, he would engage all the borderers in the enterprize; for that he could not more desire to make himself master of Guiana, than they to assist him; having been plunder'd in their wars by the Epuremei of their women, whom to recover they would willingly renew the war, without hopes of further profit; for the old king complain'd of it as a matter of grievous restraint, that now they were confin'd to three or four wives apiece, who were wont to enjoy ten or a dozen; while the lords of their enemies had no less than fifty or a hundred. But they seem to have had a political reason for this recovery, to strengthen their alliance and increase their forces, these frontiers having been much depopulated between the subjects of Inga and the Spaniards. Ralegh, after further consultation, finding it absolutely improper either to leave any of his company, or attempt war upon the Epuremei till the next year, apply'd himself now only to learn how these people wrought those plates of gold which were dispers'd about, and how they divided it from the stone. The king told him, that most of their plates and images were not sever'd from the stone; but that on the lake of Manoa, and many other rivers thereabouts, they gather'd the perfect grains of gold, and mingling a proportion of copper, the better to work it, put it in a great earthen pot, under which they increas'd the fire by the breath of men, through long canes fasten'd to the holes round the said pot, till the metal dissolv'd, which then they cast into moulds of stone and clay, and so made those plates and images; whereof Ralegh brought two sorts into England, more to shew the manner of them than their value: for he gave more pieces of gold of the twenty shilling coin, with the queen's effigies upon them, among these people, to wear in honour of her majesty, and to engage them in her service, than he receiv'd; so little did he make his desire of gold known to them. He also brought over some gold ore of their mines, "whereof I " know some is as rich (says he) as any the earth yields, and of which I know there is suffi" cient, if nothing else were to be hop'd for;" but they wanted time, hands and instruments to break the ground, without which there could be no working of mines. "We saw (adds he)
" all the hills with stones of the colour of gold and silver, and we try'd them to be no *Mar-
" quesite*; and therefore such as the Spaniards call El madre del oro, or, the mother of gold, " which is an undoubted assurance of the general abundance thereof; and my self saw the out" side of many mines of the Sparre, which I know to be the same that all covet in this world;
" and of those, more than I will speak of." Now Ralegh, besides having learn'd the riches of the country, having also won the affections of the people, and receiv'd a faithful promise of the chiefs in those provinces of Aromaia and Canuri to become servants to her majesty, took his leave of old Topiwari, and receiv'd his son prince Cayworaco as a pledge betwixt them, whom he brought into England, where he was christen'd Gualtero with great solemnity, leaving with the old king two of his own people in exchange; the one named Francis Sparrow, who being a good draughtsman, and could describe a country with his pen, desir'd to be left for that purpose, whom Ralegh instructed to travel as far as he could to Manoa with such merchandise as he committed to his care; the other was a boy, who waited upon him, named Hugh Goodwin, for whom he left orders to be taught the language of the country. This done, he weigh'd anchor, and coasted the river on Guiana-side, because he came towards it on the north-side by the lawns of Saima.

Brings the king's son into England.

THERE was a powerful casique named Putijma, who accompanied Ralegh and his men from Aromaia, with promises to lead them to a mountain call'd Iconuri, which contain'd a mine of gold; and which (says Ralegh) he perform'd. Ralegh travell'd a great way towards it himself along the river Mana, till, through weariness, he was forced with some of his attendants to rest on the banks of a lake in the delightful valley of Oiana; where one of his guides kindling a fire with two sticks,* they stay'd a while to dry their shirts, which, with excessive heat, were very wet and heavy upon them; sending captain Keymis the while with a party under that casique to take cognizance of the said mine, and promis'd to meet him at the river Cumaca, in * Succeeding voyagers have observ'd of the Karaguata Guana, a Brazilian tree about fourteen or fifteen foot high, with yellow flowers on the top, and large long thick leaves, which yield an unctuous liquor serving for soap, and fit for fishing nets; that with the wood thereof, and of another call'd Imbaita, the inhabitants kindle their fires by striking them together, as we by a flint and steel. See Nieuhoff's voyages, vol. 2. fol. 141; also Sir Tho. Brown's vulgar errors, fol. 131.

his way to Emeria; the province of Carapana, one of the greatest lords of the Orenoqueponi, with whom he fought to establish a league. And as Raleigh return'd by the river Mana towards the said province, he saw himself many rocks like gold ore, and on the left hand a round mountain of mineral stone. From hence returning down the stream, he coasted the province of Parino; but the branches of the rivers he here pass'd, with Aio and other mountains, he reserv'd to the representation in his map; which, for the numerous and distant rivers and countries therein occasionally refer'd to, appears to have been a very accurate and comprehensive performance.<sup>a</sup> In the river of Winicapora he saw what they call'd the mountain of crystal, which look'd at a distance like a white church-tower of exceeding height, over the top of which a mighty river rush'd down with prodigious noise. Berreio told him, there were diamonds and other stones of great value thereon, which blaz'd at a great distance. Upon this river Raleigh rested a while, and marched to a town of the same name, where he found the natives all as drunk as beggars, it being the time of their festival. Here Raleigh refresh'd himself with the provisions of the place; and the delicate wine of Pinas, which the people brought him and his company in great plenty. But understanding that Carapana was retir'd from Emeria; and imagining, because he was an old subtil prince, it was to wait till he should return next year, then join him, if the English were strong enough to tempt his alliance; if not, that he might excuse his retirement to the Spaniards, as tho' it were in fear of these new visitors; Raleigh spent no more time in seeking after him; but making to the river Cumaca, he met with Keymis, and took his leave of Putijma, who, of all others, most lamented his departure; for the Orenoque was now swoln most dreadfully, so that it was impossible to return by the way he enter'd, for the river of Amana could not be sail'd back by any means, the breeze and current of the sea were so outrageous: therefore he follow'd the branch of Capuri, which enter'd into the sea eastward of his ships, that he might bear with them before the wind; and great need there was so to do, having by that way as much to cross of the main sea, in their little boats, after they came to the river's mouth, as between Gravelin and Dover. But when they arriv'd at the sea-side, and anchor'd in the mouth of Capuri, they were in a most desperate condition; for there arose a mighty storm, and the river's mouth was at least a league broad, so that they run before night close under the land with their boats, and brought the galley as near as they could, which had much ado to live, and was often near sinking with all her men. Raleigh was in the utmost doubt what course to take; either to venture in the galley through six foot water on the sands for two leagues together, and that in the channel, when she drew five; or trust in such a raging wind and sea to cross over in his barge. At last, seeing the tempest increase the longer he tarried, he took Gifford, Calfield, and Grenvil, in his barge; and about midnight thrust into the sea, leaving the galley to come by day-light. "Thus faintly chearing one another in shew of courage (says Raleigh) it pleas'd God by nine a-clock the next morning we discover'd the isle of Trinidad." So they kept along the shore to Curiapan, where they found their ships at anchor; "than which (says he) there was never to us a more joyful sight;" especially when they found, upon meeting together, they had lost but one man (before-mention'd) through so many extremes of wet, heat, hunger, want of rest, sleep, lodging, and such like violent hardships in this toilsom and dangerous adventure, as drove them to many unusual and unhealthy shifts, especially in their diet; such as feeding upon many strange and corrupted fruits; upon fresh fish without seasoning; crocodiles, sea-cows,<sup>b</sup> anta's, and armed hogs; upon all sorts, of the land or water; good and bad; without order or measure; and yet no calenture befell them, or other pestilent diseases which are wont to infect all regions so near the line; so wholesom was the country, or so happily suited to their constitutions. The many praises which Raleigh further bestows upon the plenty and other felicities of Guiana, I must leave to the noble description he has writ of it, having here only extracted such parts as more chiefly respect our present endeavour at the personal history of its author.

Draws a general map of the country.

In a dreadful storm.

<sup>a</sup> This large and general map of Guiana and the neighbouring countries, Raleigh often mentions; and where he is speaking of the Orenoque; how far it is navigable; what considerable parts of the Spanish West-Indies are to be invaded thereby; to what other regions it leads, the descent of its branches; and where it falls into the sea, he tells us, these particulars, that he may not be tedious, shall better be perceiv'd in the general description of Guiana, Peru, Nueva Roma, the kingdom of Papayan and Roidas, with the province of Panagala, to the bay of Uraba, behind Carthagena westward; and to Aracama southward. Whether the title map, which I think is pick'd to the Latin edition of Raleigh's discovery of Guiana, hereafter mention'd, is a contraction of this large and general map; I do not remember, when I had that tract in my hand, to have observ'd by any inscription there may be thereon.

<sup>b</sup> Of these sea-monsters, otherwise call'd manati by the Spaniards, Raleigh says he had seen as big as a wine-pipe; others describe its flesh to be like beef, and to yield an excellent oil; the hide, being dress'd, makes good buff; and dried, good targets or armour; wherefore, we are told, Sir Walter Raleigh brought several of these hides into England. See captain Harcourt's voyage in Purchas (before-mention'd) fol. 1275.

Fires some Spanish towns.

IN his return homewards he touch'd at Cumana, to store and refresh himself with such provisions as he wanted; but the Spaniards refused to supply him, at which he threatned the town; and upon their refusing also to save it by such reasonable ransom as they had just before offer'd captain Preston, he set it on fire: the like he did at St. Mary, and at Rio de la Hach, as we are informed by Camden and others; some of whom affirm, he got not only great glory hereby, but riches; the latter of which will be thought doubtful to those who have read the Spaniards had removed their effects to the mountains, before they entered into a capitulation with Preston. On the 13th of July, when the said captain Preston, with the rest of his company, were under Cape St. Anthony, the westernmost part of the isle of Cuba, "we met (says the " writer of his voyage) with the honourable knight Sir Walter Raleigh, returning from his " painful and happy discovery of Guiana, and his surprise of the isle of Trinidad: so with glad " hearts we kept him and his fleet of three ships company (for he mentions no more) till the " twentieth day at night, at which time we lost them." <sup>a</sup>

Writes a discourse of
discoveries.

WHEN Raleigh was arrived in England, he soon applied himself to digest the observations he had made in his discoveries, and they were, not many months after, committed to the press. <sup>b</sup> Several authors have bestowed characters in praise of this discourse, which manifests such a wonderful genius in compassing the knowledge of so many places, productions, and people, with so small a power, and in so short a time. The honourable Mr. Duddely, natural son of the earl of Leicester, and afterwards a knight also of great renown for his writings and adventures, speaking of a discovery into Guiana, which had been communicated to him, says it was in the self-same manner almost such as Sir Walter Raleigh hath very discreetly written. <sup>c</sup> Camden refers those who would know more of this enterprize, to an ingenious book of Raleigh's writing, wherein he gives a most accurate description of the countries, as if he had been born and bred there. <sup>d</sup> And a later author mentions this treatise as one of those written by Raleigh, which is full of proper, clear and courtly graces of speech. <sup>e</sup> The action it self has also had many just encomiums bestowed upon it by Mr. Hakluyt, captain Harcourt, and others; the latter of whom, speaking of the Great Orenoque (at a time wherein he will not be suspected guilty of flattery to the first of our nation who explored that river) adds, wherein Sir Walter Raleigh performed his worthy and memorable discovery. <sup>f</sup> Nor could the muses forbear to celebrate such a glorious exploit, as well by the pens of those who were eye-witnesses of his toils and travel, as those who were no ways concerned in them: for captain Keymis, who bore him company, as we have observed, wrote this year a Latin copy of verses in praise of the Guianian expedition, describing the situation of the country, with its riches, and Raleigh's unparallel'd dexterity, for performing that discovery in a month, which so many brave Spaniards had in vain attempted many years. <sup>g</sup> And another learned poet, whom I take to have been Mr. George Chapman, wrote at the same time a heroic poem in English upon the same subject. Those who have read this whole poem attentively, which contains near two hundred lines, and observed what lofty strokes of praise the author bestows upon this enterprize, as well as the cordial instigations wherewith he animates his country to persevere in it, may conceive, I have had some constraint upon my self, through a regard to that proportion which is here necessary, in transcribing no more from it, than those parts wherein Raleigh is directly mentioned, when the whole redounds so much to his glory. And first, the poet, after having invoked his muse to sing the atchievement of that hero's sword, which is consecrated to his queen; and told us, the subject of his song is riches with honour, and conquest without blood; enough to seat universal monarchy, like the bird of Jove, upon Eliza's hand; and described the wealthy Guiana bowing her mighty breast, and making every sign of submission to become both the sister and the daughter of that sacred maid; he goes on thus:

*Then most admir'd sovereign, let your breath Go forth upon the waters, and create
A golden world in this our iron age;
And be the prosp'rous fore-wind to a fleet,
That seconding your last, may go before it.
In all success of profit and renown:
Doubt not but your election was divine;
As well by fate, as your high judgment order'd,
To raise him with choice bounties who cou'd add Height to his height; and like a liberal vine,
Not only bear his virtuous fruit aloft,
Free from the press of squint-ey'd envy's feet,
But deck his gracious prop with golden bunches;
And shroud it with broad leaves of rule o'er-grown,
From all black tempests of invasion.*

THEN having exhorted the queen not to let the course of her reign be like those great winds, which in the morning of their power tear up forests by the roots, raise the seas to the skies, and make the earth tremble, yet, bury their wastful bravery in the evening; but rather like a river that flows from the mountains, and grows greater the further it runs, till, mixing with the main, it takes his titles and command: having also exposed those politicians, who would be wise in spite of wisdom; who think nothing can be right but certainty, and place their faith in incredulity; that coward's castle, sluggard's cradle, and only wit of fools, which slovenly defaces all things fair: and lastly, having bewail'd the corruptions of nature in our greatest nobility, whose bodies have choak'd their minds, which are bereft of sense through excessive sensualities, till the effects of their lusts have like lightning wounded her soul through her flesh unwounded; so that she must need incitements to her recovery even from the part she hurts; the poet finely continues in these words:

*O how most like
Art thou, heroic author of this act,
To this wrong'd soul of nature! that sustain'st
Pain, charge, and peril, for thy country's good;
And she much like a body numb'd with surfeits,
Feels not thy gentle applications
For the health, use, and honour of her powers!
Yet shall my verse through all her case-lock'd ears
Trumpet the nobles of thy high intent;
And if it cannot into act proceed,
The fault, and bitter penance of the fault,
Make red some others eyes with penitence,
For thine are clear — and what more nimble spirits,
Apter to bite at such unhooked baits,
Gain by our loss, that, must we needs confess,
Thy princely valour would have purchas'd us;
Which shall be same eternal to thy name,
Though thy contentment, in thy grave desires
Of our advancement, sail deserved effect.
O how I fear thy glory which I love,
Lest it should dearly grow by our decrease!
Natures, that stick in golden-gravel'd springs,
In muck-pits, cannot scape their swallowings.*

YET the poet confiding in the Patrician spirits of the nation to encourage this sublime endeavour at such imperial enlargements of the British dominion, and especially in the temptations of the country it self, Gold, like fate, giving life and law to all our actions; presages they should all go to Gutana; that British colonies should be planted, churches and palaces built there; and that the whole world, by this heroic conquest, should pay homage to the queen of England: but it cannot be so justly described as in the lines themselves.

*Then in the Thespiads bright prophetic font,
 Methinks I see our liege rise from her throne,
 Her ears and thoughts in steep amaze erect,
 At the most rare endeavour of her power,
 And now she blesses with her wonted graces
 Th' industrious knight, the soul of this exploit;
 Dismissing him to convoy of his stars.
 And now for love and honour of his worth,
 Our twice-born nobles bring him bridegroom-like,
 That is espous'd for virtue to his love,
 With feasts and musick ravishing the air,
 To his Argolian fleet; where round about
 His bating colours, English valour swarms
 In haste, as if Guianian Orenoque,
 With his full waters fell upon our shore.
 And now a wind as forward as their spirits,
 Sets their glad feet on smooth Guiana's breast;
 Where, as if each man were an Orpheus,
 A world of savages fall tame before them,
 Storing their thrift-free treasures with gold.
 And there doth plenty crown their wealthy fields;
 There, learning eats no more his thriftless books;
 Nor valour, ostridge-like, his iron arms:
 There, beauty is no strumpet to her wants,
 Nor Gallique humours putrify her blood;
 But all our youth take Hymen's lights in hand,
 And fill each roof with honour'd progeny:
 There, makes society Adamantine chains,
 And joins their hearts with wealth, whom wealth disjoin'd:
 There healthful recreations strew the meads,
 And make their mansions dance with neighbourhood,
 Which here were drown'd in churlish avarice:
 And there do palaces and temples rise
 Out of the earth, and kiss th' enamour'd skies;
 Where New Britannia humbly kneels to heaven,
 The world to her, and both, at her blest feet,
 In whom the circles of all empire meet.<sup>a</sup>*

But the poet was no prophet in this respect; for Raleigh, with all his zeal and assiduity for the honour and advantage of his country, of which he could not give more sincere proofs than he did, by his continual forwardness to venture his fortune, and his life therein, could never induce the state to proceed in the plantation of Guiana; not so much through any real incredulity of the emoluments that would accrue from it, the superficial cause of its neglect; as through that malignant jealousy which so eternally bias'd the domestic competitors for royal favour, to curb the foreign services of enterprising men, lest the achievements of the one should outshine the administrations of the other: and this reason we may have further occasion hereafter more expressly to confirm out of Raleigh's own words; whence we may here observe, that he, whose engaging qualities had gain'd him such influence, such an ascendancy over the most savage and unciviliz'd nations, found no dispositions so barbarous and intractable among those strangers, as he did in his own country; like Hercules himself, who having, by his glorious labours, shewed his power of subduing and taming all other monsters, found envy and detraction invincible at last. That Raleigh's labours were attended with the same fate, himself has sufficiently discover'd in that dedication, which, with so much eloquence, modesty, and generosity, he made of his discourse upon Guiana aforesaid, to the lord-admiral Howard and Sir Robert Cecyl. For notwithstanding the difficulties and dangers of the voyage, "It appears (says Raleigh therein) that I made no other bravado of going to sea than was meant, and that I was never hidden in Corn-“ wal or elsewhere, as was suppos’d. They have grossly belied me, that fore-judg’d I would Traduc’d.

 “ rather become a servant to the Spanish king than return; and the rest were much mistaken;
 “ who would have persuaded that I was too easeful and sensuál to undertake a journey of so “ great travel: but (as he generously continues) if what I have done receive the gracious con“ struction of a painful pilgrimage, and purchase the least remission, I shall think all too little;
 “ and that there were wanting to the rest many miseries.” And as he had just before observ’d, in a delicate reflection upon the ungrateful custom of making one failing eclipse the merit of many virtuous actions, where he says, “ If ought might have been deserv’d in former times to have “ counterpois’d any part of offences, the fruit thereof, as it seems, was long before fallen from the “ tree, and the dead stock only remain’d.” So here he goes on; “ But if both the times past;
 “ the present, and what may be in the future, do all by one grain of gall continue in eternal “ distaste; I do not then know whether I should bewail my self either for my too much travel “ and expence, or condemn my self for doing less than that which can deserve nothing.
 “ From my self I have deserv’d no thanks, for I am return’d a beggar and wither’d; but “ that I might have better’d my poor estate, it shall appear by the following discourse, if I had not “ respected only her majesty’s future honour and riches. It became not the former fortune in “ which I once liv’d, to go journeys of picory; and it had sort’d ill with the offices of honour “ which by her majesty’s grace I hold this day in England, to run from cape to cape, and from “ place to place, for the pillage of ordinary prizes.” The insignificancy of these pursuits also in our other English adventurers to distress the king of Spain, he lays open a little further, in the following manner: “ This undertaking hath another ground and assurance of riches and “ glory than the voyages of the West-Indies; an easier way to invade the best parts thereof “ than by the common course. The king of Spain is not so impoverish’d by taking three or “ four port-towns in America, as we suppose; neither are the riches of Peru or Nueva Espanna
 “ so left by the sea-side, as to be easily wash’d away with a great flood or spring-tide, or left “ dry upon the sands at a low ebb. The port-towns are few and poor in respect of those “ within the land; are of little defence, and only rich when the fleets are to receive the trea“ sure for Spain: and we might think the Spaniards very simple, having so many horses “ and slaves, if they could not upon two days warning carry all the gold they have into the “ land, and far enough from the reach of our foot-men, especially the Indies being so moun“ tainous, so full of woods, rivers and marshes.” Here he goes on to give a large variety of examples, naming, besides the ports of Camana and St. Josepho, which he took himself, and found not therein one rial of plate, many other towns and cities which are wealthy, but of difficult access through our want of good footing in the neighbourhood of them. And leaves many more islands, ports, cities and mines in Peru and other parts unnam’d with the rest, both that the grandeur of those territories might not seem incredible, and for this further reason;
 “ Of all which (says he) because I have written a particular treatise of the West-Indies,<sup>a</sup> I
 “ will omit the repetition at this time; seeing that in the said treatise I have anatomiz’d
 “ the rest of the sea-towns, as well as of Nicaragua, Jucatan, Nueva Espanna, and the “ islands, as those of the inland; and by what means they may be best invaded, as far “ as any mean judgment can comprehend.” But Raleigh was in hopes it would appear there was now a way found out to answer every man’s longing; a richer Indies than any the king of Spain enjoy’d, which if the queen would patronize, he was willing to end the remainder of his days in reducing it to a total subjection. Whatever he further advanced of this kind, diffidence and detraction were so predominant, that because some of Ra- leigh’s company brought over marcasite for gold, as he informs us a little further,<sup>b</sup> there were some who would not believe the real gold ore which he brought, and which he had helped to dig out of the rocks with his own dagger, was of greater value. Nay, when many trials had been made of this ore,<sup>c</sup> wherein some quantities were proved by one Westwood, a refiner in Wood-street, to hold after the rate of twelve or thirteen thousand pounds a ton.
 Other parcels, by Mr. Bulmar and Dimock, assay-master, found also to hold after the rate of twenty-three thousand pounds the ton; and a third sort tried by Mr. Palmer, comptroller of the Mint, and Mr. Dimock in Goldsmiths-Hall, holding after the rate of twenty-six thousand nine hundred pounds the ton; who tried also some gold dust of the same mine, which held eight pound six ounces weight of gold in the hundred, and an image of copper made in

Guiana, and probably of this which he brought at this time, has been so carefully preserv’d in his family, that it is now in the possession of captain William Flete; who, among other communications relating to Sir W. Raleigh, has courteously oblig’d me with a sight thereof.

Discredited. Guiana, which held a third part of gold: when all this was prov'd, there were those who would not yet believe it gold of Guiana; but that Ralegh purchas'd it upon the African coast, and carried it over thither. "Surely, the singularity of that device (says Ralegh) I do not well comprehend: for my own part, I am not so much in love with these long voyages, as to devise thereby to counsel my self; to lie hard, to fare worse, to be subject to perils, to diseases, to ill favors, to be parch'd and wither'd, and withal, to sustain the care and labour of such an enterprize; except the same had more comfort than the fetching of marcasite in Guiana, or buying of gold ore in Barbary. But I hope the better sort will judge me by themselves, and that the way of deceit is not the way of honour or good opinion. I have herein consumed much time and many crowns, and I had no other respect or desire than to serve her majesty and my country thereby. If the Spanish nation had been of the like belief with these detractors, we should little have fear'd or doubted their attempts wherewith we now are daily threaten'd. But if we now consider of the actions both of Charles V, who had the maidenhead of Peru, and the abundant treasures of Atabalipa, together with the affairs of the Spanish king now living; what he has added to the acts of his predecessors; how many kingdoms he has endanger'd; how many armies, garrisons and navies he maintains; the great losses he has repair'd, as in eighty-eight, above a hundred sail of great ships, with their artillery; and that no year is less unfortunate, but that many vessels, treasures and people are devour'd; and yet that he begins again, like a storm, to threaten shipwreck to us all; we shall find that these abilities arise not from the trades of sack and Seville-oranges, nor from ought else that either Spain, Portugal, or any of his other provinces produce; it is his Indian gold that endangers and disturbs all the nations of Europe; it creeps into councils, purchases intelligence, and sets bound loyalty at liberty in the greatest monarchies thereof: if the Spanish king can keep us from foreign enterprizes, and from the impeachment of his trades; either by offer of invasion, or by besieging us in Britain, Ireland, or elsewhere, he has then brought the work of our peril in great forwardness: for those princes, who abound in treasure, have great advantages over the rest, if they once constrain them to a defensive war, where they are driven, once a year or oftener, to cast lots for their own garments." <sup>a</sup> For these and other substantial reasons which Ralegh produces, he declares, he has labour'd all his life, both to the utmost of his own power and persuasion of others, in the promotion of those attempts which promis'd either an enlargement of our own national interest, or an abatement of the encroaching greatness of the Spaniard, who, in his judgment, is not to be more easily reduc'd than by such a war; from so many weak nations are his treasures gather'd, and so far separated from mutual succour. But because he thought such resolution and preparations were not to be hoped for in haste, he doubted not, if her majesty would embrace the offer of those provinces, and that empire now by him discover'd, before they were engross'd by the enemy; but it would yield greater quantities of treasure than all the king of Spain possesses from the Indies, both East and West; and he would be contented to lose her good opinion for ever, and his life withal, if the country should not be found to exceed whatever had been promis'd in his discourse of it. <sup>b</sup> Tho' he has therein written, he doubts not after the first or second year that the same should be coloniz'd, but to see in London a contraction-house of more receipt for Guiana, than that in Seville for the West-Indies. And is positive, "That if there was but a small army a-foot in Guiana, marching towards Manoa, the chief city of Inga, he would yield to her majesty, by composition, so many hundred thousand pounds yearly, as should both defend us from all enemies abroad, and defray all expences at home; and that he would besides pay a garrison of three or four thousand soldiers very royally to defend him against other nations: for he cannot but know how his predecessors were beaten out by the Spaniards, and that they have ever since, with the greatest cruelties, fought the entry of his country, wherefore he would doubtless be brought to tribute; if not, having neither shot nor iron weapon in his empire, he might easily be conquer'd." <sup>c</sup> And in another part of the said discourse, he has these words, "If it be my lot to prosecute the same, I will willingly spend my life therein; and if any else shall be enabled thereto, and conquer the same, I assure him thus much, he shall perform more than ever was done in Mexico by Cortez; or in Peru by Pizarro, whereof one conquer'd the empire of Mutezuma, the other of Guascar and Atabalipa; <sup>d</sup> and whatsoever prince shall possess it, that prince shall be lord of more gold and of more beautiful empire, and of more cities and people, than either the king of “ Spain or the Great Turk.”<sup>a</sup> Concluding his whole treatise of Guiana with “ his trust, in him who is the King of kings and Lord of lords to put it into her heart who is the Lady of ladies to possess it; if not, I will judge those men worthy to be kings thereof, says he, who by her grace and leave will undertake it of themselves.”

ALL this, and much more, would not do to raise the saternine, or rather malignant genius of the state to pursue this action; and upon this occasion we might observe, as Raleigh did afterwards upon another<sup>b</sup> from a poet of his own time,<sup>c</sup> That some great men cloathing their private envy in the fair colours of the publick good, curbed the most needful and noble undertakings with distrust, through a specious care for the service of the state. Among these sage and sceptical politicians, we may discern Sir Robert Cecyl to be one, who, in his conferences with some of the speculative geographers of his time, would shew how careful he was not to be overtaken with any partial affection to the planting of Guiana, as we are told by one of them, whom he would consult about the matter; and who, perhaps therefore, admires, in a dedication to him, as the manner is in this sort of writing, with no small joy, the exact knowledge he had acquired in matters of Indian navigation.<sup>d</sup> Nevertheless, Raleigh's advice was not wholly disregarded. For that part of it before-mention'd, proposing to drive the Spaniards to a defensive war, but upon their own proper coasts or harbours, was approv'd of; and Raleigh himself chosen, with other commanders, as we shall soon find, to put it in execution. In the mean time, however discourag'd in his new discovery, he would not relinquish it; but within six months after his return, that is, in the latter end of January following, he fitted out captain Keymis with a couple of ships, the Darling and Discoverer; but provided, rather to continue the correspondence and peaceful traffic with the Indians, than to strengthen them in a warlike manner with forces and accoutrements, which was what they most desir'd and expected. When Keymis arriv'd at Guiana, he found his friends much disperfed, but yet enquiring what was become of Sir Walter Raleigh, whom they had been prepar'd some months to join? were mighty joyful to hear he was not slain at Cumana, as the Spaniards, now much increas'd among them, had attested; but sadly disappointed that he had not sent a larger fleet to expel them, and conquer their neighbouring enemies up to the imperial city. Keymis further learnt, that Berreio, being left at Cumana, and lodged in the house of one Fashardo; the governors of the Caraccas and Margarita, conspiring together, had sent into Spain to inform king Philip, that Berreio, being retired to spend the remainder of his declining days in privacy and ease, was utterly unable to pursue the enterprize; yet of what importance his majesty's regard thereto was, since so eminent an English cavalier, as Sir Walter Raleigh, had, by a vigorous progress and most artful address, made such conquests and discoveries in some parts, and render'd himself so extensively engaging in all where-ever he came, that unless they had power given them to undertake the charge, all their past endeavours and future hopes in those parts would come to nothing.<sup>e</sup> But Berreio's camp-master having been long before sent into Spain, with gold enough gotten out of Guiana, to levy and furnish five hundred men, so effectually solicited Berreio's cause, that present order was given for the victualling and manning of ten ships to be sent him; so well worth his care did the king of Spain think this undertaking. And further, this gold bore such weight, that the king commanded eighteen ships more to stop at Trinidad, and not follow their other directions, before they saw that place secur'd from enemies. But Berreio himself suspecting that speedy dispatch, return'd to Carapana's port with fifteen men, the scatter'd remnant that Raleigh had left him. Those governors follow'd him, and anticipating the authority they promis'd themselves from Spain, enter'd Guiana with their men, and deter-

<sup>e</sup> How much alarmed Spain was at this attempt of Raleigh's, Count Gondomar is introduced thus confessing to his ghost, in a pamphlet, writ not long after his death. “ The tottering ground whereon my king's title to the Indies stood, that it was nothing but violence and force, tyranny and Usurpation; and that if a stranger or more gentle army should enter, how easy it was to set us besides the cushion: this I know thou knewest, and what not beside, which belongeth to so great an attempt and “ Triumph.” And a little further, “ I dare not (for the honour of my nation) unfold the woeful perplexity in which Spain stood during this tedious voyage; how she quaked to think of the general view which thou hadst taken, without impeachment of all the West-Indies; but most of all, when she was advertis'd of thy long and laborous passage upon the river Orenoque, the distinguishments which thou hast made betwixt it and the river of Amazons, and the intelligences which thou hadst gotten for thy ascent to the great city of Manoa and kingdom of Guiana: Desfer, which if they had been pursued, according to thy willingness and knowledge, we had not at this day acknowledged one foot of earth for ours in all the West-Indies.” Sir *W. min'd to murder Berreio, who fled towards Caroli, expecting his son Antonio de Ximenes with succours from the new kingdom of Granada. And now Topiowary, who had fled to the mountains, being dead, where the English boy, Ralegh left, was devour'd by a tyger, Sanjago, a Spaniard, in the faction of the governors aforesaid, took Francis Sparrow prisoner, who was also left by Ralegh, as has been related; but having gather'd great plenty of gold, he ransom'd his life therewith, yet was kept in captivity by the Spaniards some years, as we may hereafter learn. After this, the faction return'd to Trinidad, and begun to rebuild their town, where, unhappily to these new lawless rulers, the twenty-eight sail of ships arriv'd from Spain in February following, and took Sanjago, one of the busiest among them, prisoner, whom Keymis found in chains, expecting to be put to death. The other actors in this interlude vanishing in canoes, recover'd Margarita, and Cumana again. When eighteen of those ships had left all things in good order, they departed according to their instructions, leaving the other ten to fortify at Conquerabia, for the reception of Sir Walter Ralegh's fleet. Nor was it above four months after the arrival of those ships from Spain, that the king had prepared several others, it being in June 1596, to transport a new supply of whole families, to the number of six hundred persons, for Guiana; so little did this prince mistrust that the planting thereof would not turn to account. But these ships not sailing before Ralegh himself visited the coast where they lay; what work he made among them, and the rest of the Spanish navy, will now in a little space demand our attention.

His account of the gold mines in Guiana confirmed.

When Keymis was advanced to Topiowary's port, he found the Spaniards under Berreio had planted a village there, and that a rocky island against the mouth of Caroli was their fort or refuge; but now leaving both town and island, they gather'd at the mouth of that river, and had sent for cannon to defend the passage to "those mines, says Keymis to Ralegh, from whence " your ore and white stones were taken the last year:" adding, " we all, not without grief, " to see our selves thus defeated, and our hungry hopes made void, were witnesses of this their " remove." Then Keymis resolved to seek out Putiima, who, with some friends, was retir'd to the high lands, not far from the mountain Aio; intending, if the Indians should think themselves too weak with his help to displant the Spaniards, to set some of them to work, for hatchets and knives, to return him grains of gold and white stones from such places as they should be directed to. But when he came to the place of their aboad, they were fled, apprehending him and his company perhaps to have been a party of Spaniards. " Here, as Key- " mis goes on, Gilbert my pilot offer'd to bring us either to the mine of white stones near " Winicapora, or else to a gold mine which Putiima had shewed him, being but one day's jour- " ney over-land from the place where we now staid at anchor. I saw far off the mountains adjoin- " ing to this gold mine; and, having measured their paths near the same place this last year, could " not judge it to be fifteen miles from us. I do well remember, how coming that way with " Putiima the year before, he pointed to this same mountain, making signs to have me go with " him thither. I understood his signs, and marked the place, but mistook his meaning; ima- " gining that he would have shew'd me the over-fall of the river Curwari from the mountains. " My Indian shewed me in what sort, without digging, they gather the gold in the sand of " a small river named Macawini, which springs and falls from the rocks where this mine is. " And further told me, that he was with Putiima when Morequito was to be executed by the " Spaniards, and that then the chief of Morequito's friends were in consultation to shew this " mine unto them, if it might redeem their captain's life; but upon better advice, supposing " them in this case to be implacable, and that this might prove a means to lose not only their " king, but their country, they have to this day conceal'd it from them, being of all others " the richest and most plentiful." And a little further, among the reasons he gives for his not bringing proofs away from this mountain of his having known the contents of it, this is one, " Forethinking withal that there being no means but our selves to make known our dis- " covery, if we return'd not; in our misfortune, the hope of following this voyage would be " buried." And further still, he says, " I could promise hope of gold mines, and certain " assurances of pieces of made gold; of spleen-stones, kidney-stones, and others of better " estimate: but because our belief seems to be mated in these greater matters, and a certainty " of smaller profits is the readiest inducement to quicken our weak hopes, I go not so far, " says he, as my own eyes might warrant me." These testimonies, and others which may be produced,* will both shew, that Ralegh was not more sanguine in his golden hopes and pro-

* Francis Sparrow, above mention'd in the body of the work, confirms this account of the mines in these words: " Orenoque, I came to the rich country of Cucua in Guiana, where are the mines of white stone, in which is much natural and fine gold, which the Indians call Cathay "

mises, than the experience of other men, as well as his own, would justify; and withal, from the authority of these professions, that his choice was rationally grounded in making Keymis his agent for the further discovery of these mines many years afterwards; when, because he was not so successful as a prejudic'd and greedy government expected, the whole undertaking was, with the most flagrant ingratitude, branded as a fictitious project to impose upon his country, since indeed there was no imposition, unless where it is most unlikely there should be any, none being so great a sufferer thereby as Raleigh himself. But more of this in its due place.

WHEN Keymis was arriv'd at the port of Carapana, this casique sent some of his people in canoes to assure him he would come down next day and have a conference with him; but not coming in five or six days, he at last sent one of his aged attendants to excuse the fatigue of such a journey, so unfavourable were the ways, and himself so disabled with years and infirmities. This old envoy then enlarged upon the inconveniences they felt in using the Spaniards assistance against their enemies, especially when he compared their conduct with that of the queen of England's subjects under her great commander: "For, said he, the last year, we doubted not but that he, being able, would have persecuted us as the supporters of your adversaries; would have taken our towns, and have made us ransom our wives and children: but we found it far otherwise; and that none of your well-govern'd company durst offer us any wrong; no, not when undiscover'd they might have done it. We then believed to be true, what your grand captain reported of his princess; took this for a good proof of her royal authority and wisdom, that had framed her subjects to such obedience; and of your happiness, who enjoy'd the benefit thereof: wherefore Carapana, weighing the friendly course of these proceedings, doth humbly crave of her majesty, for himself and his people, that with the rest of the Indians, who wholly depend on her princely regard, he also may enjoy her favourable protection; not as a man forsaken by the Spaniards, but one that, knowing their injustice, hates their cruelties, and takes it for the best course utterly to disclaim their friendship." Here Keymis breaks off, to consider it as a matter worthy of observation, how this precedent of Raleigh's moderation and good order, which, among them, his countrymen, who knew him, was but his customary comportment, or ordinary practice, therefore of small regard with them, had yet both alienated the Indians hearts altogether from the Spaniard, and stirred up in them true love and admiration thereof. After this, he discloses his further knowledge of the Indian wealth aforesaid in these words: "This old man shewed whence most of their gold cometh which is formed in so many fashions; whence their spleen-stones, and others of all sorts, are to be had in plenty; where gold is to be gather'd in the sands of their rivers; from what part the Spaniards, both by trade and otherwise, have returned much gold;" and doubts not but all this was divulged with the consent of Carapana, as an invitation to the further aid and protection he expected from the English.

The effects of his noble conduct among these Indians.

ACCORDINGLY Keymis, finding it was in vain to hope for a conference with that well-wishing, but wary casique, and, having sent him a present of iron, gave assurance to all the Indians who repaired to him of his speedy return with succours; promising to make them all rich in hatchets, knives, and beads, if they would only reserve good store of their cassavi (which they

"Callicurii. The gold in this place runs between the stones like veins, of which gold I had some store; but now the Spaniard is the better for it. In Curaa is also gold in small grains, which lie in the sands in the little rivers or brooks: I always took those grains for the finest gold. In these rivers where gold lieth are many Aligartos or Crocodiles." See the description of the isle of Trinidad, the rich country of Guiana, and the mighty river of Orenoque, written by Francis Sparrey (as my author writes him) left there by Sir W. Raleigh 1595, but taken by the Spaniards, and sent prisoner to Spain, who, after long captivity, got into England by great suit 1602. In Purchas's Pilgr. vol. 4. fol. 1249.

Captain Harcourt also gives this evidence to the same purpose; "As I daily convers'd among the Indians, it chanced that one of them presented me with a half moon of metal which held somewhat more than a third part gold, the rest copper. Another also gave me a little image of the same metal; and of another, I bought a plate of the same, which he call'd a spread eagle for an axe. All which things they assur'd me were made in the high country of Guiana, which they said did abound with images of gold, by them called carrecoory. These things I shewed to my company, to "settle their troubled minds, which gave much contentment to the greater part of them, and satisfied us all that there was gold in Guiana. Shortly after that, my Indian, Anthony Canabre, brought me a piece of a rock of white spar, whereof the high country is full; and if the white spars of this kind, which are the purest white of all others (for every sort of mine hath a spar, and for the most part white) be in a main rock, they are certainly mines of gold or silver, or of both. I made trial of a piece of spar which the same Indian discover'd to me, and I found that it held both gold and silver; which, altho' it was in small quantity, gave me satisfaction that there be richer mines in the country to be found; but the best lie deeper in the earth, and we had not time nor power to make search for them." See the said captain Harcourt's voyage to Guiana, Anno 1603, dedicated to prince Charles, in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1277.

"These instruments were such preferable commodities among some of those Indians, that Francis Sparrowe, in his description of Guiana before-mention'd, tells us he bought at Camalaba, to the south of the Orenoque, eight young women, the eldest whereof was not eighteen years of age, for one red-hafted knife, which in England cost him one halfpenny.

used for bread) and some plates of gold, for exchange. And having further spent some time in the discovery of above fifty several rivers, tribes or nations of people, towns and casiques in this voyage, of all which he has given us a very accurate table, he directed his course homewards, and arrived at Portland in the latter end of June aforesaid; having spent five months in going, staying, and returning. As soon as he got home, he found Ralegh had been gone upon a grand expedition out of the nation near a month. Therefore he had time to draw up his account of this voyage (whence the passages which more immediately relate to our subject are extracted) ready to present him with at his return into England; which he did, and dedicated it To the approv'd, right valourous, and worthy knight Sir Walter Ralégh, lord warden, &c. In this dedication, he expresses himself in a most respectful manner, and highly to Sir Walter's honour for the great cost and travel which he had bestowed upon this discovery; telling him “the fervent zeal and loyalty of your mind, in labour with this birth of so honourable expectation, as it hath deserved a recompence far different (from what he had been describing) so needeth it not my poor suffrage to endear the toil, care and danger you have willingly undergone for the good and advancement of our weal publick: the praise-worthiness thereof doth approve itself; and is better read in your living doings, than in my dead unregarded papers,” &c. Subscribing himself, Your lordship's to be commanded in all service. And in his preface To the favourers of the voyage for Guiana, among the sensible motives he uses to remove all fig-leaves from our unbelief, and the examples he urges to exprobrate our remissness, one (which Ralegh had before touch'd upon with that modesty wherewith he always alludes to himself) is given by our author Keymis in these words: “If we should suppose our selves now to live in the days of king Henry VII, of famous memory, and the strange report of a West-Indies, or new world, abounding with great treasure, should entice us to believe it; perhaps it might be imputed for some blame to the gravity of wise men, lightly to be carried with the persuasion and hope of a new-found Utopia by such a one as Columbus was, being an alien, and many ways subject to suspicion: but since the penance of that incredulity lies even now heavy on our shoulders; the example fore-threatening I know not what repentance: and that we have the personal trial of so honourable and sufficient a reporter, our own countryman; let it be far from us to condemn our selves in that, which so worthily we reprove in our predecessors, and to let our idle knowledge content itself with naked contemplation, like a barren womb in a monastery.” But in his relation of the voyage itself, which he concludes with many cogent and strenuous arguments, drawn from the justice, profit and necessity of prosecuting it, he introduces that conclusion with a paragraph which sets Ralegh forth so strongly, in his principal point of light; having persisted more inflexibly, through greater discouragements, in more exalted pursuits than any other of his contemporaries, by seeking, not a private, so much as a national benefit; not a transient, but perpetual aggrandisement of his country, that this author's grateful acknowledgment thereof demands an undeniable admission; which therefore take as follows.

“Thus have I emptied your purse, spending my time and travel in following your lordship's directions for the full discovery of this coast and the rivers thereof. Concerning the

* Yet has our nation been reproached for our many neglects of this kind even to this day: a modern author observes, “That none of all our late bubble-projectors so much as ever propos'd one subscription for making any discoveries like Sir Walter Ralegh's in Virginia and Guiana. Where, says he, was the set of men who offer'd to subscribe to a fund for searching out the north-west passages to navigate to the pole, and solve the difficulty which all the proficients in geography speak of only by conjecture, viz. whether Europe and America join, or the Tartarian ocean is to be travers'd or no? Have any men yet subscrib'd to a company for discovering the continents or islands of the seas, more truly call'd the South-Seas, I mean due south of the cape de Bona Speranza, or due south of the Terra del Fuogo? Do we think there are any lands worth possessing in all the vast southern tracts from forty or fifty degrees south to the other pole of the world? Why are not these parts as well worth searching as the bottoms and deeps of Hudson's and Davis's Straights, or the icy mountains of the Waggats and Nova Zembla? The short is, our projects are all bubbles, and calculated for Exchange-Alley discoveries, not for enlarging our commerce, settling colonies, and spreading the dominions of our sovereign from pole to pole. Why has no bold adventurer followed the glorious Sir Walter Ralegh upon the river of Amazon, the “Rio Parano, and the Great Orenoque? where thousands of nations remain undiscover'd; and where the wealth, the fruitfulness of the soil, the goodnets of the climate, and the infinite numbers of the people, exceed all that has ever been conquer'd or discover'd in the American world: but all is owing to the mercenary low humour of the times we live in, who, groveling in the baser methods of getting money by fraud and bite, by deceiving and over-reaching one another, scorn the glorious ways by which our ancestors grew rich, when they pursued, together with their private advantages, the honour and interest of their native country and of their posterity. If our subscriptions had been for such things as these, and the management had appear'd to be as fair, as the design was honourable, we had never had an act of parliament to suppress them as public nuisances and a scandal to a Christian government; but the British nation would have been encourag'd to exert itself to the utmost in them: whereas now we are all degenerated into bubble and bite, and the Exchange as well as Exchange-Alley is become a mere gaming stage, where, instead of merchants carrying on useful commerce, we see throngs of fitters and cullies shuffling and cheating one another.” See the Humourist, being essays upon several subjects, vol. 2. 8vo. 1725. p. 40, 41.

“ not making of a voyage for your private profit, I pretend nothing. Sorry I am, that where “ I sought no excuse, by the Spaniards’ being there, I found my defect remediless. And for my “ own part, I do protest, that if the consideration of the public good which may ensue, had “ not over-pois’d all other hopes and desires, I would rather have adventur’d by such small “ and weak means as I had, to do well with danger, than to return only with safety. Now “ altho’ in a cause not doubtful, my allegation is no way needful, yet because the weightiness “ thereof, and the expectation of others, seems of right to claim something to be said by me, “ whom your especial trust and favour have credited and grac’d with this employment : par“ don it, I beseech your honour, if where my lamp had oil, it borrow light also, and my “ discourse touching this discovery. The particular relation of some certain things I have re“ served as properly belonging to your self, who only, as knowing most, can make best use “ thereof. So much in general is here touch’d, as may serve, I hope, to refresh the memory of “ this worthy enterprize in those it may concern, and testify your care and expence in follow“ ing the same : That in a second age (when in time truth shall have credit, and men, won“ dering at the riches and strength of this place, which nature it self hath marvellously forti“ fied as her chief treasure-house, shall mourn and sigh to hold idle sickles, whilst others reap

 “ and gather in this harvest) it be not said, SIR WALTER RALEGH was, of all men “ living in his days, most industrious in seeking, most fortunate in attaining to the fulness of an “ inestimable public good : if, knowing that for envy and private respects, his labours were les“ sened, his informations mistrusted, his proffers not regarded, and the due honour of his de“ serts imparted to others : if (I say) seeing, knowing, and bearing all this, he with patience “ had persisted in so good a way in doing his princess and country service, and had but perfected
 “ his first discovery by sending a ship or two for that purpose ; for then surely all lets and doubts “ being removed, and so large a kingdom, so exceeding rich, so plentiful of all things as this by “ his discourse appeared to be, being offer’d ; no devices and vain surmises could have taken place ;
 “ no illusions could have prevail’d ; it had been blindness and deafness in those who, being near her “ majesty, do spend their days in serving the commonwealth, not to see and know in so weighty a “ matter ; it had been malicious obstinacy, impotence of mind, and more than treason to the com-

WHEN Keymis return’d into England, Raleigh, as we observ’d, was abroad, being sent upon that enterprize which proved the most victorious and renowned of any the English undertook in those days against the Spaniards. For the queen having heard they had received encouragement from Tir-Oen, the Irish rebel, to threaten her with a new invasion ; that because she had strengthened their enemies, they would take the shortest course, and begin with England.<sup>b</sup> Therefore had made great naval preparations, to which they might not be a little embolden’d both by the death of her two brave old commanders, Drake and Hawkins ; and again by their late success, no further from her own coasts than Calais ; which taking by storm, under cardinal Albert, archduke of Austria and governor of the Netherlands, the thunder of the Spanish artillery alarmed her majesty’s ears in her palace at Greenwich. This posture of affairs made the queen determine, with the advice of her council, to use the most effectual means for preventing the mischiefs of an assault, by taking the start of them, and sending a force sufficient to destroy the Spanish shipping in their own harbours.<sup>c</sup> Accordingly, a powerful fleet was fitted out to the number of a hundred and fifty sail, according to Camden from Stow, and Speed from both. But in the old manuscript list of this fleet, which Camden followed as to the number of men, it appears there were no more than ninety-six ships of the English navy,<sup>d</sup> which were afterwards join’d by twenty-four sail of Hollanders, as I gather out of Grotius and their other historians. As to the number of men ; the general calculation at the end of that list aforesaid, was taken upon trust by Camden, or he would not have given it us without doubt ; for it neither does agree with the erroneous sums under the particular heads of ships, mariners, captains, and soldiers, nor with the true ones which have since it was printed, been subjoin’d ; and if it did, it would not give satisfaction ; the list it self being manifestly defective in omitting the land-companies which went over in the capital ships: so that not to be too scrupulous, the account which will best correspond with all variations is, that this English fleet contain'd about fourteen thousand men, whereof one thousand were volunteers. For as yet the English nobles and gentry had not learnt to live lazily and loosely at home, while their countrymen were fighting abroad for the safety and glory of the nation.<sup>a</sup> Now if to this number of men, we add also that in the Dutch ships, which according to their own computation was near twenty-six hundred men, there might be enough to leave the whole fleet furnish'd with sufficient hands to guard and work it, and allow of ten thousand three hundred and sixty men to land upon the Spanish coast, as it is propos'd in the conclusion of the list before-mention'd.

The lord-admiral Howard and the earl of Effex were joined in commission generals of this enterprize; but the queen considering what there might be wanting to keep an old head and a young one, a cool and a warm one in due temper and harmony, allotted them a council of war in these words. “For the better and more orderly execution of this your commission, and of those former articles comprised in these our instructions, we do ordain, that there shall be two persons serving for the seas, and two that are appointed to serve with the forces for land-service, to be as counsellors to you in our name, that is, the Lord Thomas Howard, Chosen of the council of war, and Sir Walter Raleigh; Sir Francis Vere and Sir Coniers Clifford; and to these four, we do add Sir George Carew, lieutenant of our ordnance, to make the number of five; whom also we charge by these presents, that they will, as they will answer before God, give their counsels to you both, without any private respect to either of you, for love or fear, in all actions to be put in question or taken in hand; and the same deliberately to debate, as the weight of the matter shall require, before any resolution be made, and before the putting of the matter in action.”<sup>b</sup> There is further to be understood by those two persons serving for the seas, that the Lord Thomas Howard and Sir Walter Raleigh were also constituted admirals in this expedition. Hence was the whole English fleet divided into four squadrons, and so it appears in the list aforesaid, wherein we find that which was commanded by Raleigh consisted of twenty-two ships, thirteen hundred fifty-two mariners, and eighteen hundred seventy-five soldiers. The Dutch squadron was commanded by the admiral of Holland, named John Duvenword, Lord of Warmond. How Effex relish'd the division of authority, may be somewhat guess'd at by the queen's answer to one of his letters it seems, which she thought very strange. “You mention, says she, first a danger to commit authority to any other, because you are referr'd to your commission and instructions formerly sent you, which hath no power of deputation; as who should say, that if you did follow the directions of our hand, our great seal in this matter should be brought to dispute the validity of your warrant.” A little further it appears, that he had been impatient to be gone for fear he should be detain'd, for the queen had perswaded him to stay behind; but not prevailing, she now gave him liberty to depart, and told him, “Tho' we meant to drive it to the last considerations and utmost debates as much as could be, yet we compared times so sufficiently, as a prince who knows what belongs to such a matter, that nothing should be done to retard you (being ready) one hour: for as we know Raleigh not to be arriv'd, so we know after it, some time to embark such an army must be required.”<sup>c</sup> But Raleigh joined the fleet, and the whole army was embark'd within ten days after the writing of this letter, for on the first of June before-mention'd the fleet set sail from Plymouth.<sup>d</sup> When they came to the north cape of Spain, they called a select council, by hanging out the flag of arms; and then had the master and captain of every ship his sealed instructions given him, or letters of rendezvous, which were not to be open'd till they were past Cape St. Vincent, unless separated by bad weather; but to be thrown overboard in case of danger from the enemy; and by which it appear'd the voyage was determin'd for Cadiz. They had a fortunate progress, both as to the wind, and the taking of every ship which

<sup>d</sup> Sir Francis Vere, who was now marshal of the land-forces, and who would incline us to think nobody's services even at sea in this expedition, were so considerable as his own, tho' he was not allotted to any signal service, having (as he owns) till now been a stranger to actions at sea, says further, “During this stay of the army about

Plymouth (which, by reason of the contrariety of winds, was near a month) it pleased my lord of Effex to give me much countenance, and to have me always near him, which drew upon me no small envy; inasmuch as some open jars fell out between Sir Walter Raleigh, then rear-admiral of the navy, Sir Coniers Clifford, sergeant-major-general of the army, and my self; which the general qualified for the time, and ordered, that in all meetings at land, I should have the precedence of Sir Walter Raleigh, and he of me at sea.” Vere's commentaries, fol. Cambridge, 1657. p. 30, and 26. But those jars could not spring from such envy in Raleigh, who never coveted that favour which Vere courted.

could give the enemy intelligence of their approach. On the twentieth of June the fleet came to anchor in the bay of St. Sebastians, short of Cadiz half a league. The lord-admiral, being careful of her majesty's ships, had resolved, with the earl of Essex, that the town should be first attempted, to the end that both the Spanish galleons and galleys, together with the forts of Cadiz, might not all at once beat upon the English navy. Raleigh was not present at this resolution, as himself has declar'd in that account of this action, which he dispatched soon after it was over to a minister of state in England; <sup>a</sup> which being the clearest I have met with, and easiest to be confirmed, not only by the more indifferent pens of foreigners, but the most partial ones of our own country, those of his competitors themselves for honour in this engagement, will here be our best guide. Hence therefore we learn the reason of Raleigh's absence at that resolution of first landing the army to have been, because he was engaged the day before outward on the seas in stopping such Spanish ships as might pass out from St. Lucar or Cadiz along the coast. <sup>b</sup> When he return'd, two hours after the rest, he found the earl of Essex disembarking his soldiers, having put many companies into boats, with intention to make his descent on the west side of Cadiz; but the billows were so raging, that the boats were ready to sink at the stern of the earl, and divers were lost with some armed soldiers in them; <sup>c</sup> but because this course had been resolved on, and that doubting, now in the danger, might look like dreading of it, the earl continued his purpose of landing; when Raleigh came aboard his ship, and, in the presence of all the colonels, protested against the resolution; giving him many reasons and apparent demonstrations, that, to the utter overthrow of their armies, themselves, and her majesty's future safety, he was running the way of a general ruin. The earl excused himself, and laid it upon the lord-admiral, who would not consent (he said) to enter with the fleet till the town was first possessed. All the commanders and gentlemen present besought Raleigh to dissuade the attempt, <sup>d</sup> for they all perceived the danger, and were convinced that the greatest part must perish ere they could set foot on ground; and if any reached the shore, yet would they surely have their boats cast on their heads; and twenty men, in such a desperate descent, might defeat them all. The earl hereupon prayed Raleigh to go and persuade the lord admiral, who being also by him made sensible, that certain destruction would be the consequence of pursuing the former resolution, consented to enter the port. When Raleigh brought Essex the news of this agreement, <sup>e</sup> and call'd out of his boat entramos, entramos, as he return'd towards him, the earl threw his hat into the sea for joy, and prepared to weigh anchor. The day was now far spent, and it required much time to return the boats of soldiers to their own ships. So as that night they could not attempt the fleet, "Altho' many, seeming desperately valiant, thought it a fault of mine, says Raleigh, to delay it till morning, <sup>f</sup> tho' we had neither agreed in what manner to fight, nor appointed who should lead, and who second; whether by boarding or otherwise; neither could our fleet possibly recover all their men in before sun-set. But both the generals being pleased to hear me, and many times to be advised by so mean an understanding, came again to anchor, and in the very mouth of the

<sup>b</sup> In a foreign history we have this circumstance thus further confirm'd and enlarg'd. "Raleigh was dispatched before with certain ships to set upon some great vessels, which, as they heard, were ready to sail out of St. Lucar's bay; but they lay so near the shore, that he could not approach them, and was further hinder'd by a mist in which they escap'd; but they were by Raleigh so nearly chased to the land, that his own ships were in danger to have run on ground." See The Triumphs of Nassau, fol. 1613. p. 187. translated by H. Shute, gent. from the French book call'd, Les Lauriers de Nassau: ou description & representation (en taille douce) de toutes les victoires gagnées par les états sous la conduite & gouvernement du prince Maurice de Nassau, fol. a Leyden; par Jean Jeantzoon Orlers, & Henry de Haellens, 1612.

<sup>c</sup> An author who was in the engagement, observes, that in this hasty attempt of the earl's, a barge was sunk, having fourscore soldiers in her, and that eight of them were drowned. See the Cadiz voyage in Hakluyt, and the abridgment in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1929.

forces, was one of them who was for landing with the earl at the Caletta, as plainly appears from his own words; and having no command in the fleet, it is no less visible he envied those who had, the honour of a naval victory. For how maliciously has he disguis'd and disparag'd this signal service of Raleigh's! where he says, "This day the generals met not together, but the lord-admiral had most of the sea-officers aboard with him, and the lord of Essex had those for land-service, and Sir Walter Raleigh was sent to and fro betwixt them with messages; so that in the end, it was resolved and agreed upon to put the next tide into the bay." See Vere's commentaries, fol. 27, 28; but not one word, alho it was that dissuaded them from their first rash attempt; and alho brought them to this agreement; when even foreigners have given us more of the arguments wherewith the earl was persuaded by Raleigh alone, than Raleigh himself has done. See the Triumphs of Nassau, fol. 187.

<sup>f</sup> Raleigh himself was the first who complain'd of delay, by that indiscreet attempt of landing, both against the storm and the enemies ships, between them and the shore; but now the delay was necessitated, not only by the distance of the Spanish fleet up the bay, but the danger of being be-nighted, and then fighting in a freight and among the rocks. See the Triumphs of Nassau, as before; but Raleigh himself has given the best reason for their delay this night, which is, their having as yet agreed on no scheme or method of engagement; which must have brought all to confusion.

Lays down the order of fight.

“harbour. So that night, about ten a-clock, I wrote a letter to the lord-admiral, declaring therein my opinion, how the fight should be order'd; persuading him to appoint to each of the great galleons of Spain, two great fly-boats to board them, after the queen's ships had batter'd them; for I knew that both St. Philip and the rest would burn, and not yield; and then to lose so many of the queen's ships for company, I thought too dear a purchase, and what would be term'd but a lamentable victory.” This method being agreed on, and both the generals persuaded to lead the body of the fleet, the charge of the van, for putting it in execution, was, upon Raleigh's request, granted and assigned to him. The ship himself was in, called the Warspile, was one of the queen's, and carried about two hundred and ninety mariners. The rest, appointed out of her navy to second him, were, the Mary-Rose, commanded by Sir George Carew, the Lion by Sir Robert Southwell, the Rainbow by Sir Francis Vere, the Swiftsure by captain Cross, the Dreadnought by Sir Coniers and Alex. Clifford, the Nonpareil by Mr. Robert Dudley; besides twelve Londoners and certain fly-boats.<sup>a</sup> Thus the lord Thomas Howard, because the Mer Honeur, which he commanded, was one of the greatest ships, was also left behind with the generals; but being impatient thereof, he pressed them to have the service committed to him, and to that end exchange'd his ship with Mr. Dudley. Hereupon Raleigh observes, “For my own part, as I was willing to give honour to my lord Thomas, having both precedency in the army, and being a nobleman whom I much honour'd; so I was yet resolved to give, and not to take example for this service, holding my own reputation dearest.” Therefore with the first peep of day he weigh'd anchor, taking the start of all others a good distance,<sup>b</sup> and bear with the enemy, who was in the following disposition to receive him.

UNDER the walls of Cadix were ranged seventeen galleys, which lay with their prows to flank his entrance. There was also a fort call'd Philip, which beat into and commanded the harbour, besides the ordnance, which lay all along the curtain upon the wall towards the sea, and divers other pieces of culverin which scour'd the channel. Notwithstanding, as soon as the enemy perceived an English admiral under sail approaching, several of their galleons and other ships of war, with forty great vessels besides bound for Mexico and other parts, also set sail. Of all which, the St. Philip, Matthew, Andrew and Thomas, being four of the capital galleons of Spain, came again to anchor under the fort of Puntal, in a streight of the harbour which leads over to Puerto Real. On the starboard side of them, they placed three frigats of war; at their back, two great galleons of Lisbon, besides two well furnish'd argosies; and the seventeen gallies by three and three, were to interlace them as occasion should be offer'd. The admiral, vice admiral, and rear admiral of New Spain, with the body of the fleet,<sup>c</sup> were ranged behind them towards Puerto Real, hoping with this great strength to defend the entrance, the place being no broader from point to point, than that their line did in effect stretch over the streight as a bridge, and had besides the fort of Puntal for their guard.

van.

RALEGH, as aforesaid, advancing in the van, was first saluted by fort Philip,<sup>d</sup> next by the cannon on the curtain, and lastly in good order by the seventeen galleys which lay near the town with all their prows bent against him as he enter'd. Raleigh answer'd the firing of their

<sup>a</sup> The Triumphs of Nassau having told us, that every commander strived to have the vanguard, further add, “The council, resolving not to hazard the queen's great ships but upon urgent necessity, thought fit that Sir Walter Raleigh, with eight of the queen's lesser ships (instead of seven) six Hollanders, and twelve English merchant-men should have the vanguard.” fol. 187. The reason why Raleigh mention'd not the Hollanders, and the English merchants but slightly, is, because they were made little use of.

<sup>b</sup> The Triumphs of Nassau observe, “the resolution of giving Raleigh the van being oppugned by the lord Thomas Howard, who said that honour belong'd to him (as vice-admiral) it was concluded that both of them should go together; but Raleigh, as soon as it was day, to lose no time in weighing anchor, let slip, and thereby had the advantage of sailing first.” fol. 188.

<sup>c</sup> The number of ships in the bay of Cadix is not so exactly agreed upon as their situation, by those who saw them, which Raleigh has describ'd the best of any, because some take more notice, some less, of the Spanish merchant-men. Sir Francis Vere only says, “In the mouth of the bay, thwart the rocks called Los Puercos, there lay to our judgment forty or fifty tall ships, whereof were four of the king's greatest and warlikest galleons, eighteen merchant-ships of the West-Indian fleet outward-bound and richly laden, the rest private merchants.” Comment. fol. 27. So that he saw but four men of war. Another who was there, says, “Between five and six a clock in the morning our ships, with all speed, “courage and alacrity, set upon the Spanish ships then under sail, and making up the bay of Cadix towards Puerto de Suazo, being in number fifty-nine tall ships, with nineteen or twenty galleys attending on them, sort'd in such good order and reasonable distance, as might still annoy us, and relieve themselves interchangeably.” Vid. the Cadix voyage in Hakluyt, and the Abridgment in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1929: so he mentions no merchant-men. But another having mention'd fifty-seven great ships, besides twenty galleys and a few other vessels of war, distinguishes also a fleet of thirty-five sail richly laden for the West-Indies, with as much wine, oil, lace, cloth of gold, and other precious merchandize, as was worth eleven or twelve millions of ducats. Triumphs of Nassau, fol. 186. This was the fleet above-mention'd in Raleigh's account, and near the number, bound for Mexico.

<sup>d</sup> Sir Walter Raleigh afterwards, exemplifying how little a resolute and experienc'd man of war will fear to pass by the best appointed fort of Europe, with the help of a good tide and a leading gale of wind; and how hard a matter it is to stop a good ship without another as good to encounter it, says, “The fort St. Philip terrify'd not us in the year 1596, when we enter'd the port of Cadix; neither did the fort at Puntal, when we were enter'd, beat us from our anchoring by it; tho' it play'd upon us with four demi-cannons within point-blank from six in the morning till twelve at noon. Hist. of the World, lib. 5. cap. 1. sect. 10.

ordnance with a flourish of his trumpets, and still kept driving forwards, that he might draw up a sufficiency of the English fleet into play, and to engage those he passed by, while he was in action upon the body of the enemy.<sup>a</sup> Accordingly the ships that followed beat upon the galleys so thick, that they soon betook them to their oars, and got up to join with the galleons in the streight, as aforesaid;<sup>b</sup> then as they were driven to pass near him, he bestow'd his benediction from several broadsides among them; but ply'd St. Philip, the great and famous admiral of Spain, most constantly, as being most worthy of his fire, accounting the galleys but as wasps in regard of that sea-monster; and being now resolved to repay the enemy's former treatment of the Revenge, or to second her loss with his own life, he came to anchor by the great galleons, whereof the Philip and the Andrew were the two which boarded that brave English ship. Here he fell to battering of them very briskly, expecting, after a while the flyboats to come up, that he might board and take them. And now began the engagement to be very desperate. The lord Thomas came to anchor on one side of him, tho' pretty much behind,<sup>c</sup> with Sir Robert Southwell; Sir George Carew and the Cliffords on the other, and Sir Francis Vere was towards the side of Puntal. At last the thunder of the ordnance grew so great about ten a-clock in the morning, that Essex, impatient to abide far off, thrust up through the fleet, heading all those on the left hand, and on that side, anchor'd next to Raleigh; afterwards came in captain Cross as near as he could; but Raleigh, to his great honour, held always single in the head of all.<sup>d</sup> Now after they had beat, as at two butts, one upon another almost three hours; so that the volleys of cannon and culverin came as thick as if it had been a skirmish of musketeers, till Raleigh's ship was in danger of sinking in the place, he made away to Essex in his skiff, to desire that he would inforce the promised flyboats to come up, that he might board; for, as he rid, he could not long endure so great a battery. Essex was then coming up himself; to whom Raleigh declared, That if the flyboats came not, he would board in the queen's ship; for it was the same loss to burn or sink, and one he must endure. Then the earl promis'd him, That whatever he attempted, he would second him in person upon honour. In the mean while, the lord-admiral Howard, being also at first disposed to advance, but the river was so choaked, that he could not pass in the Ark, came with the lord Thomas in the Nonpareil; and while Raleigh was speaking to Essex, "the marshal (Vere) who thought it some touch, says Raleigh, to his great esteemed valour, to ride behind me so many hours, got up a-head of my ship; which lord Thomas perceiving, headed him again, myself being but a quarter of an hour absent. At my return, finding my self from being the first to be but the third, I presently let slip anchor, and thrusting in between the lord Thomas and the marshal, went further a-head than all of them before, and thrust myself athwart the channel, so as I was sure none should outstart me again for that day." Essex thinking his ship stronger than

A sharp engagement.

<sup>a</sup> The Triumphs of Nassau says, "the Spanish gallies discharged all their ordnance upon Raleigh; but he made not one shot, leaving it to those that follow'd him, and so went directly towards the galleons which lay in the deepest part of the river, and with two other very great ships took up the whole breadth of it," fol. 188.

<sup>b</sup> Sir William Monson, describing the situation of the enemy, or manner of riding in their harbour at his first sight of them, agrees very well with this part of Raleigh's account, where he says the four galleons singled themselves from out of the fleet as guards of their merchants. "The gallies were placed to flank us with their prows at our entry; but, when they saw our approach the next morning, the merchants run up the river, the men of war to Port-Royal, and brought themselves into a good order of fight, mooring their ships a-head and stern to have their broadsides upon us. The gallies then betook themselves to the guard of the town, which we put them from, before we attempted the ships. See his Naval Tracts. But Vere takes this service entirely to himself in these words: "As the Spanish ships loosed from their anchors and made from us, their gallies, seventeen in number, under the favour of the town made towards us, ranged in good order. My ship was floaty, and stored with good ordnance, which made me hasten towards them without staying for any company, &c. So as I entered fight with them alone, and so galled them with my ordnance, that they gave back, keeping still in order and fight with me, &c." At last, says he, "I put them from under the town, and took certain ships which rode there at anchor forsaken of her men, and followed continuing in fight till they came under the fort of the Puntal,

"where thwart the bottom of the bay lay their four great ships with a distance between them; and, spreading the breadth of the channel, were now in hot fight of ordnance with our fleet." Vere's Comment. fol. 30, 31.

<sup>c</sup> Tho' this passage of lord Thomas's being now far behind is not mention'd by Raleigh, in the letter he then wrote of the Cadix action, which we here chiefly follow; yet I, have it from his own hand-writing, in the printed book called Les Lauriers de Nassau, before-mention'd, a copy of which history falling into his hands soon after it was publish'd, Sir Walter Raleigh has, in the language it is writ in, made short notes with a black-lead pencil throughout this whole action, where himself is mention'd, which are not only still legible, but demonstrable to be his own writing, both from the sense and form of the characters. In the margin of this copy against the words that signify, "The lord Thomas to have come up to Sir Walter Raleigh with six of the queen's ships as near the galleons as possible, discharging all their ordnance; and fighting from six a-clock in the morning till noon;" Raleigh has written with his pencil, Mais bien Arriere. This curiosity is in the possession of Thomas Brian Esq; of the Inner-Temple, who has favoured me with the use of those notes; the better to illustrate this part of their author's story.

<sup>d</sup> Hence might it be, that Raleigh's ship lost most men, and yet very few, in comparison of the length and heat of the engagement; and also might be one of those which was shot through two and twenty times, since none seems to have been so much disabled, as may appear a little further. Vide Abridgment of Hakluyt in Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1930.

the rest, thrust Clifford's aside, and still got next to Raleigh, on the left hand, a-head of all that rank, but lord Thomas; while Vere secretly fastned a rope on Raleigh's ship-side towards him, and drew himself up equal with him; but some of his company advertising him thereof, he caused it to be cut asunder, so Vere fell back into his place, whom Raleigh guarded all but his prow from the sight of the enemy. <sup>a</sup>

galleons destroy'd.

And taken by him.

BUT now Raleigh having no hopes of his flyboats, and Essex with the lord Thomas having promised to second him, <sup>b</sup> he laid out a warp by the side of the Philip to close, the wind hindering him otherwise to board her; and when the admiral thereof, with the commanders of the other three wooden apostles, found that Essex and the lord Thomas began to do the like, they all slip'd anchor, and ran aground; heaps of soldiers and mariners tumbling into the sea like coals out of a sack, says Raleigh, into many ports at once; some drowning, some sticking in the mud. He also tells us, the Philip thereupon burnt herself; and another author more particularly in these words: "As Raleigh thought to have boarded the great galleon "St. Philip, a negro gave fire to the powder, and escaped by swimming; it gave so great a crack, that the mast was blown up into the air, as if it had been an arrow. A pinnacle that lay near it was burnt, but the men escaped in boats. The other galleon, called St. Thomas, was likewise blown up, but did no harm to the English." He also mentions "two easterlings which ran ashore, and were burnt; but, says he, the St. Matthew and St. Andrew, of ten or twelve hundred ton apiece, were saved from running aground, and carried away." <sup>c</sup> However, he does not inform us particularly by whom; and others seem to have done Raleigh more wrong, in nominating other persons, and omitting him in the performance; since it appears under his own hand-writing, that he took them both himself. <sup>d</sup> And this agrees with the manner his letter of this action in print has expressed it, where he says, "those galleons were recover'd with our boats ere they could get out to fire them." Here he observes upon the enemies running to the shores, and thus firing their ships, that the spectacle was very lamentable on their side; for many drowned themselves; many half burnt, leaped into the water; very many, hanging at the ropes-ends by the ship's-side under the water, even to the lips; many swimming with grievous wounds, till struck under water, and put out of their pain; and withal such huge fires, and such tearing of the ordnance, in the Great Philip and the rest, when the flames came to them, that Raleigh thought there was here to be seen the most lively figure of hell it self.

THUS the victory was obtained by sea, and the bay resign'd by two, some say, by four a-clock in the afternoon; <sup>e</sup> tho' no more of the English were constantly and closely engaged, than the ships and commanders before-mention'd, against the six great galleons, seventeen gallies, with the fleet of New Spain, argosies, and frigats, to the number of fifty-five, or fifty-seven, as Raleigh himself reckons them, besides the fort of Puntal playing upon them all the while. After the victory, "Ourselves spared the lives of all, says Raleigh; but the Flemings, who did little or nothing in the fight, used merciless slaughter; till they were by myself, and afterwards by my lord-admiral, beaten off." <sup>f</sup>

THEN did they hasten to land the army, and attempt the town<sup>s</sup>; in which there were of all sorts about five thousand foot, one hundred and fifty soldiers in pay, and about eight hundred

<sup>a</sup> This contention of Sir Francis Vere's for precedency again, he owns in these words: "Sir Walter Raleigh, very little a-head of me, cast his anchor, as did also the general, and as many of the fleet as the channel would bear; so as the shooting of ordnance was great, and they held us good talk, by reason their ships lay thwart with their broadsides towards us, and most of us right a-head, that we could use but our chasing-pieces. I sent my boat aboard Sir Walter Raleigh to fasten an hauser to wind up my ship, which was loosed soon after my boat was put off." Vere's Comment. fol. 32.

<sup>b</sup> The Triumphs of Nassau seem to explain the reason of the flyboats not coming up, where we find those of Lubeck and Dantzick fell into contest with the English ones about that service. After which, the commanders being aboard the general, they resolved to assail the galleons, commanding, says this history, the lord Howard and Sir Walter Raleigh to begin. See fol. 188. Against which last assertion Raleigh, in that which was his own French copy of this book, has written, À Moy seul; as much as to say, that desperate charge was committed to him alone. Mr. Brian's copy of Les Lauriers de Nassau, p. 133. And as much is implied above, in the text, from Raleigh's own epistolary account, which says, the lord Thomas promised to second him.

<sup>d</sup> J'ay pris tous deux, are Raleigh's own words in the margin of his Lauriers de Nassau, even with that period which expresses the taking of these two galleons, but not the person who took them.

<sup>e</sup> I meet with no author but Sir William Monson, who prolongs the victory by sea to four a-clock.

<sup>f</sup> An author, who was present at this victory, speaking of the proclamation that was published by the generals and council, to prevent all further bloodshed after the surrender by the Spaniards, says, this honourable and merciful edict was, I am sure, strictly and religiously observ'd by the English; but how well it was kept by the Dutch, I will neither affirm nor yet deny; for I perceive between them and the Spaniards there is an implacable heart-burning. And therefore, as soon as the Dutch squadron was espied in the fight, immediately both they of Seville, St. Lucar, and other places, did not only arrest all such Dutch ships as dealt with them friendly by the way of traffick and merchandize, and confiscate their goods, but imprison'd the merchants and owners of the same; and, by report, treated many of them with extreme cruelty. Vide Hakluyt, and Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1931.

<sup>g</sup> Cadix was a large and beautiful city, and being the chief see of the bishop, had a good cathedral church, abbey, monastery, hundred horse,<sup>a</sup> of the gentry and cavaliers of Xetres gather'd together upon the discovery of the English fleet two days before, as they lay becalm'd off Cape St. Mary. The horsemen sallied out to resist their landing, but were so vigorously assail'd and overpower'd by the English, that the greatest part made away to the bridge which leads to the main, called Puente de Suago; the rest retreated to the town, and were so eagerly pursued, that they were driven to forsake their horses at the gate, which the inhabitants durst not open to admit them; so that they were forced to leap down an old wall into the suburbs, which the English vanguard, close at their heels, perceiving, with Essex at their head, followed them; and so the town was carried with a sudden fury,<sup>b</sup> in a short space of time,<sup>c</sup> and with very little loss.<sup>d</sup> Raleigh, tho' he had received a grievous wound in his leg, being much torn and deformed with a splinter-shot in the fight; yet, willing to encourage the army with his presence, and desirous of seeing the actions and dispositions of the enemy, he was carried ashore on the shoulders of his men, where the lord-admiral, out of his care and regard, sent him one of his horses; but his own being recover'd in due time, was made ready for him. The torment he endur'd, and the fear he was continually in of being shoulder'd by the tumultuous soldiers, abandon'd to spoil and rapine, without any respect of persons, made him unable to abide above an hour in the town.<sup>e</sup> The same night therefore he return'd, chiefly because there was no admiral on board to order the fleet, or indeed few mariners left in the navy; all, to use his own words, running headlong to the sack; and also because he was fit for nothing but rest and retirement at that time: otherwise he might, like the rest of the commanders, have rewarded himself for his services. But leaving them in safe possession at his departure, they promised to preserve for him his share of the booty, and to give him a good quarter of the town; of which, as we have it under his own hand, they defrauded him.<sup>f</sup> He had desired the consent of the generals, that he might go and secure or destroy the Indian fleet, which was said to be worth twelve millions, and lay in Puerto-Real road; but they desired to consider on it till next morning. At break of day, Raleigh sent his brothers, Sir John Gilbert, and Sir Arthur Throgmorton, as also Sir Henry Leonard, to know their resolution; but the generals sent back to desire he would come ashore into the town.<sup>g</sup> Raleigh very favourably imputes these evasions to the great confusion, in which it was almost impossible for them to order many things at once. In the afternoon of the same day, the merchants of Cadiz and Seville offer'd the generals, by the Committee of the contraction-house, with the purveyor, corrigidor, and other officers, two millions of ducats to spare that nery, and fine college of Jesuits; was strongly situated both by nature and art; the buildings of hard stone, all flat-roof'd, after the Turkish manner; so that having lodged heaps of great stones on the tops of their houses, every woman could endanger the passengers in the streets, which were very narrow, perhaps to avoid the great heat. All the houses had fair window-frames, and large folding shutters; but were barr'd with iron, and none glazed, except the churches. They had few chimneys, but in some lower out rooms for necessary uses; seeming to be more careful of keeping themselves from roasting, than to have much of any thing roasted. Abridgment of the Cadiz voyage in Puchas, vol. 4. fol. 1932.

<sup>a</sup> Puchas also adds, the town had above four thousand fighting men, and six hundred horse, well furnish'd, no doubt, so many ships being always at hand, and so well stored with ammunition. Another author writes, the number of men and women might be eight or nine thousand. Triumphs of Nassau, fol. 192.

<sup>c</sup> Before eight a-clock that night, the English were masters of the market-place, forts, town, and all but the castle, which held out till break of day.—Thus was this notable victory, as well by sea as land both begun, and in effect perform'd within the compass of fourteen hours. Puchas, as before, fol. 1931, 1932.

many, mere creatures and flatterers. The earl thought he should strengthen his party and interest thereby, and has warmly justify'd himself in his apology for shewing them that distinction; but it weaken'd him in the queen's opinion to see him ape her prerogative, or play king Robert so extravagantly. And what may we think she said of this number? when for his having before made twenty-four knights at the succour of Rhoan, none of whom were in meaner circumstances than many of these, the queen said, My lord might have done well to have built his almshouse before he made his knights. Lord Bacon's Apophthegmes, p. 17.

<sup>e</sup> Raleigh entered the town with the lord-admiral, lord Thomas Howard, Sir W. Paget, Sir Robert Southwell, Levison, Woodhouse, Mansell, and the mariners; Sir Edward Hobbly, carrying the colours before them, about the time of the great skirmish in the market-place, soon after which the Spaniards retir'd and capitulated; agreeing to pay five hundred and twenty according to Camden; or, according to Stow, six hundred and twenty thousand duckets (which is five times more than foreign authors mention) for the ransom of their lives, and to give forty hostages for the payment. After the surrender, order was given to transport the religious men and women, merchants wives, &c. to Port St. Mary, that no violence might be offer'd them. They had also liberty to take as many of their cloaths or goods as they could carry with them; which produced a remarkable example in a beautiful young Spanish lady, who, leaving all that was precious and valuable, bore away her old and decrepit husband upon her back, whom before she had hidden from the danger of the enemy; herein imitating the piety of the Bavarian women, after the conquest of their country by the emperor Comade III. See Sandys's notes on Ovid's Metam. lib. 13. fol. 449.

fleet; neither could this bring them to any resolution, so that advantage was lost.<sup>a</sup> Raleigh might possibly insist upon a larger composition, by saying, They ought first to be masters of the fleet, and ransom it afterwards; for if they offer'd two millions already, they would give four when it was taken; because he has not denied this speech where he had read it ascrib'd to him.<sup>b</sup> But it appears plain enough to me, from the same author, that Effex was not for having the fleet seiz'd upon, unless by Sir Christopher Blunt, Sir Edward Conway, Sir Thomas Gerrard, and other land-officers, which Raleigh would not consent to for the honour of the sailors; as it does appear from Camden, that the lord-admiral would not consent to any composition. For we came, said he, to consume them, and not compound with them. But they saved him the trouble; for the next morning, being the 23d of June, the duke of Medina caused all that fleet of merchant-men to be set on fire, because he was convinced, from their being beset so vigilantly by Raleigh, who had the charge of them, that they must needs fall into his hands. Thus both galleons, frigats, argosies, with the fleet of Nueva Espana, and all except the gallies, which it seems escaped, were consumed to ashes. Good store of the enemy's ordnance was recover'd out of their ships, and great quantities of merchandize, plate, jewels and money, out of the town: their whole loss being computed at twenty millions of ducats.<sup>c</sup> Many rich prisoners were given to the land-commanders, "so as that fort were very rich, says Raleigh; some "had for their prisoners sixteen or twenty thousand, some ten thousand ducats,<sup>d</sup> besides great "houses of merchandize. What the generals have gotten I know least (concludes he;) they "protest it is little: for my own part, I have gotten a lame leg, and a deformed; for the "rest, either I spoke too late, or it was otherwise resolved. I have not been wanting in "good words, or exceeding kind and regardful usage; but have possession of nought but "poverty and pain."

dian fleet.

Thus have we related this action chiefly from Raleigh's letter before-mention'd, the credit whereof is the less obnoxious to any doubt, in that it either here is, by our endeavours, or might be by those of an able pen, sufficiently corroborated out of other writers upon the same subject. But there is one letter more, written by another ocular witness of all his behaviour in this victory, at their leaving of Cadiz, early enough for the perfect memory thereof; to the lord Burghley, a man dangerous to deceive with misrepresentations; and further, written by an old land-commander, under the earl of Effex, who even never saw Sir Walter Raleigh before this voyage: therefore a testimony, that carries many marks of truth, and none of partiality in his favour. For which reason, and because it has never yet seen the publick light, I shall here transcribe all that is said, being concise, not only of one, but every commander mention'd therein, that my reader may, unbiass'd by me, distinguish what a principal share of honour is paid to the merit of Sir Walter Raleigh's councils and courage throughout the whole engagement: but these are my author's words. "My lord, this I must say, that never prince of England hath "receiv'd more true glory and reputation than our sovereign in this, wherein these two nobles "have commanded with such valour, love and good intelligence, as we, that have been under "them, received thereby singular comfort; and truly, my lord, they deserve as much honour "as may be heap'd on them. We surpriz'd the enemy, whereby this mighty and rich Indian "fleet of forty-five sail of good, and some of them mighty ships, have been consumed to "ashes; a ruin to this king, not to be recover'd in all his days; besides the cutting off this "year's voyage, and consequently the next. By this voyage, if no other gain, this only hath "much satisfied me, that I have thereby seen and known the men of worth of our nation. Of the "earl I will say nothing, but of the lord Thomas, the lord marshal Vere, and Sir Walter Raleigh, "I must say, that in no bickering where I have been, I ever saw men more forward and valiant

<sup>c</sup> The earl of Effex, in a brief narrative of the advantages accruing to England, and losses to the Spaniard, by this expedition, says, "the English took two galleons, "routed fifteen galleys, with an unequal number of ships; "freed many of their countrymen condemn'd to the gal- "leys, and releas'd several Spaniards from imprisonment; "took the best fortify'd city in all Spain, and stay'd thir- "teen days in their country; brought home, besides the "galleons aforesaid, a hundred brats guns, with a rich "booty; and the sailors, but especially the soldiers, "great plunder; the enemy lost thirteen of his most ser- "viceable ships, forty Indian merchant men, and four "others, besides vast quantities of ammunition, provi- "sions, &c. rendering it almost impossible he should in "some time appear again at sea in a formidable manner." Iude Camden, Ann. 1596. Tho' such was their loss, and computed as above; yet the earl wrote a paper of objec- tions hereafter-mention'd, against his colleagues, for not doing more.

The Triumphs of Nassau sums up the Spanish loss thus: "Three and thirty great ships laden for the Indies were "burnt, besides five ships which came from St. Lucar, "three of which ran aground. It was the greatest and "wealthiest fleet that ever went to the Indies." And a little further, "The wealthy town was wholly sack'd, "and the booty great, which was carried to the ships. "Twas thought the king lost at the same time 5200 "pieces of ordnance, besides armour sufficient for five "or six hundred men, which was taken out of the arse- "nal," fol. 191, 192.

<sup>d</sup> Sir Francis Vere says, "I got three prisoners worth "ten thousand ducats; one of which was a church-man, "and president of the contraction-house of the Indies; "the other two were ancient knights," whom he names. Comment. fol. 42.

“ in the matter of combat between our ships, and their ships and galleys, wherein stood all the “ success of the victory, which my lord of Essex did give beginning to by anchoring in the ene“ my’s face, Sir Walter close by his side; and so the rest before-named; also the general of “ the artillery (Sir George Carew) with his Mary-Rose, a proper gentleman, full of good things,
 “ and, above all, of discretion. When all these aforesaid had placed themselves, and the rest,
 “ as the channel would give us leave, the thunder of the artillery on both sides began at ten in “ the morning, and lasted till two and a half in the afternoon; at which time her majesty’s ships “ made the enemy give ground, and the three great ships of war, the Philip, Matthew, and “ Andrew, ran themselves ashore; and the Philip they fir’d, the other two we bring you “ home. Sir Walter Raleigh did, in my judgment, no man better; and his artillery most effect:
 “ I never knew the gentleman until this time, and I am sorry for it, for there are in him excel“ lent things besides his valour; and the observation he hath in this voyage used with my lord “ of Essex, hath made me love him.” A little further he says, “ In the Due Repulse (Essex’s “ ship) we lost only seven men; in the Warspite (which was Raleigh’s) fourteen, and “ Sir Walter cut in the leg with a splinter.”<sup>a</sup> Lastly, he mentions his true and faithful “ friend, Sir John Wingfield, who lost his life in the town-house, and thereby was rid of a “ mighty discontent which all the way had much afflicted him,” having one day told my au“ thor, “ that he had rather leave his life here, than carry it again into England.”<sup>b</sup>

It was long disputed, whether the town should be held or no, says Sir Francis Vere; who adds, that my lord of Essex seemed to affect to remain there in person; as, we may add, Vere did too; because, he says, he offer’d to defend it with four thousand men, till her majesty’s pleasure should be known;<sup>c</sup> when, in truth, the queen’s pleasure, in this particular, was known before they left England: for Essex himself informs us, he sent letters from Plymouth (before they set sail) by his secretary Edward Reignold, to the council at Greenwich; wherein he purposed “ to dwell in a port of the enemy’s, and to make a continual diversion of the “ wars;” but, says he, “ My letters were neither answer’d, nor liked of.”<sup>d</sup> And much less was the same proposal now relish’d in Cadiz, when so many wanted to guard and secure the treasures they had got; and it was computed, they would all soon grow in want of provisions; nay, one of his own knights advis’d him to master and destroy ships rather than towns, as what would make the enemy more unable to molest them, and procure him wealth and solid honour, without riot and ruin of the innocent; besides, the riches in ships could not be so easily conceal’d and convey’d away, as in towns; also they might be brought into England, and would be visible monuments to his glory; but towns, tho’ soon won, could not be long enjoy’d.<sup>e</sup> For these and other reasons Essex was prevail’d upon, tho’ with great reluctance, to leave Cadiz; but they first of all caused the city to be raz’d, and, with the castles and fortifications, fired, all but the churches and religious houses; together with all the naval tackle and provision they could meet with, which they either needed not, or could not conveniently carry away. Their courtesy however to the people, especially of distinction, and all who had made no opposition, was such, that, at their departure, the Spaniards did the English the justice to say, Tho’ they were hereticks as to religion, yet as to the rest, they had behaved themselves with generous bravery.

The city and naval stores fired.

On the 5th of July the army embark’d; and in council, it was insisted on to lie out at sea for intercepting the West-Indian fleet; “ but the scarceness of our victuals, says Vere, “ overthrew that purpose.” So resolution was taken to make for England, and visit the Spanish coasts in the way, to destroy their shipping. The first place they made to was Faro, a good large populous town, but unsenc’d, and a bishop’s see of Portugal. Here the English

<sup>a</sup> Raleigh afterwards made a very good remark upon ship-building (which probably the memory of this smart might induce him to) in these words: “ Men may not expect the ease of many cabbins, and safety at once in sea service. Two decks and a half are sufficient to yield shelter and lodging for men and mariners, and no more charging at all higher; but only one low cabin for the master. But our mariners will say, that a ship will bear more charging aloft for cabbins; and that is true, if none but ordinary mariners were to serve in them, who are able to endure, and are used to the tumbling and rolling of ships from side to side, when the sea is never so little grown: but men of better sort would be glad to find more steadiness and less tottering cage-work. And altho’ the mariners do covet store of cabbins, yet indeed they are but flutish dens, landing, and marching up to the town, the inhabitants deserted it, and left them in full possession; who, after having rested and refreshed themselves five or six days, brought good store of provisions to the ships; also some pieces of artillery, and the valuable library of the late famous bishop Oforius.<sup>a</sup> There is an author who mentions the taking of this town, and consequently that library, among Raleigh's victories; describing the buildings to have been left so demolish'd, as to yield no covering for their idols.<sup>b</sup> But since that library is observ'd by Camden to have been thought by right Effex's prize, as if this earl had somehow contended to engross it to himself; it may somewhat direct us, to whose greater value for the labours of the learned, and more publick spirit in this particular, 'tis owing, that it was more commendably bestow'd; being brought into England, says Monson, and made (it seems) an exemplary foundation of the publick library which was begun by Sir Thomas Bodley the ensuing year at Oxford. What share Raleigh had in this disposal, towards the said renowned undertaking of that learned knight, his countryman and acquaintance, authorities are wanting, further than by surmise from these premises, to certify. But this we have expressly enough transmitted to us of him by Bodley himself, even in the next reign, about nine years after this time, when Raleigh was under great misfortunes; and therefore, when an act of munificence must shine with the greatest splendor, that he generously contributed towards the improvement of that library the sum of fifty pounds; "for which, says Sir Thomas Bodley, I will intreat the vice-chancellor "to move the university for their letters to him (and the other benefactors mention'd with "him) of publick thanks;"<sup>c</sup> which, doubtless, they gratefully paid: but to return.

WHEN the forces were got again on board, they sailed to the Groyne, and looked into the bay; but the wind being unfavourable, they thought it dangerous to enter; therefore, and because their victuals daily grew more scarce, so that in some ships there was already extreme want, says Sir Francis Vere, it was resolved to make homewards:<sup>d</sup> however, Sir William Monson, in favour of Effex's impatience to go on upon fresh exploits, computes they had enough provision to supply them seven weeks. Monson also imputes the general declension of the officers from any further invasion of the Spaniards at this time, to the covetousness of those who wanted to secure the treasures they had amassed.<sup>e</sup> And indeed Vere discovers not any concurrence now with Effex's new schemes of adventure, as might have been expected towards a patron who had shewn him so much favour and countenance; but visibly hastens home upon the complaint of scarcity aforesaid. And yet that which might be thought Vere's true motive for returning, was never imputed to the lord-admiral nor Sir Walter Raleigh, tho', both by speech and writing, they argued for it as much as any; for they had engross'd no booty that might be endanger'd by entering upon further engagements abroad. Yet had they other objections to these inconsiderate projects, than the want of victuals or sickness of men; for after both these inconveniences in Raleigh's ship were propos'd to be redress'd by Effex, as Monson tells us, Raleigh was as resolute against hazarding the honour, as others the riches that was got at Cadiz; and in this entirely agreed with the lord-admiral, who persuaded them to consider how subject they might be to great losses in little enterprizes,<sup>f</sup> which would not add much to

<sup>a</sup> This was Hieronymus Oforius, a native of Lisbon, and bishop of Sylves and Algarva; characteriz'd by foreigners to have been a man of strict virtue in his morals, and master of a florid pen in his writings; which were publish'd at Rome in four volumes, by his nephew, who also wrote his life. This bishop was, for none of his writings, more noted with us, than his Epistolary Admonition to queen Elizabeth, and his controversy with that learned orator and civilian Dr. Walter Haddon; who dying in the year 1571, before he had completed his last book against Oforius, it was finish'd and publish'd by John Fox the martyrologist in 1577, and four years after translated into English; wherein Fox charges the bishop's book against the Doctor with being full of lies, calumnies and errors: and the lord Bacon, where he notes, among the distempers of learning, that luxuriancy of style which began to prevail in Luther's time, with the causes thereof; which introduced an affected study of eloquence, and grew to such excess, that authors regarded a roundness of period more than richness of invention, soundness of argument, or depth of judgment; and were charm'd rather with softness than strength, sweetness than solidity, and sublimity of words than weight of matter; he instances, among others then growing into esteem, the flowing and their praise if they succeeded; but surely would to their discredit if they fail'd. This being the sense of the greater or the wiser part, most of the fleet return'd with the lord-admiral to Plymouth on the eighth of August following; and the rest, with the earl of Essex, two days after; who thence took his journey to court, as Raleigh probably did at the same time. On the thirteenth of the same month, we find by a letter from the council of state to the lord-admiral,<sup>a</sup> then advanced with the fleet to the Downs, that Raleigh as well as Essex had been with them, and probably with the queen; from whom we hear of no objections made to Raleigh's conduct in the whole action: therefore probably he was among those principal actors therein, whom she distinguish'd with liberal praises and rewards. Yet that letter does discover her majesty's dissatisfaction towards the lord-admiral, that he did not lie in wait for the carracks or the West-Indian fleet, as Essex had intreated him to do. And whereas Sir Francis Vere says, that when Essex landed in the west, and left orders with him for dissolving not only the land-forces, but the shipping, there arose much strife between the said mariners and his Low-Country troops at their parting, the sailors being determin'd to share in the chests and packs wherewith the soldiers had most unproportionably enrich'd themselves in the late spoil; at which Vere complain'd to the lord-admiral for redress, adding, that some other principal officers of the fleet took the sailors part; and, as if they thought them unreasonably dealt with, who had made way by the sea-fight, for the soldiers to get those riches by land, ask'd him, "whether the mariners should have nothing?" To which he answer'd, "their hopes in the Indian fleet were more to be desired than that trash (as he calls it) which the land-men had got in the town; so as they had none to blame but their officers, and their bad fortune:" which answer, says he, was taken to heart, and is not forgotten to this hour, of which I feel the smart.<sup>b</sup> If Raleigh was one of those principal officers here pointed at, who thus stood the sailors advocate, as he might be, notwithstanding his expeditious progress to court, the indifferent manner wherewith Vere has treated him is very accountable to me. But Vere has further betray'd his partiality, in not telling us the consequence of his said application to the lord-admiral, which appears in that letter and others, from the council aforesaid, to have procur'd the disposal of the Spanish plunder towards the payment of the English navy; and that Vere's Low-country regiments should not return before they were search'd both in ships and person. As for Essex, he wrote a Censure of the omissions in this voyage,<sup>c</sup> which he imputes to the dissensions of his council and colleague. Whence the common historians have been led indiscriminately to arraign the setting forth such expeditions under commanders of equal authority, and have so much neglected giving these their distinct commendations for what they did, as to cavil at them for what they left undone; while others more gratefully observe, That never was so much riches and renown acquir'd with the like naval success; well justifying the honours which were paid to Sir Walter Raleigh both by the authors who dedicated books to him this year;<sup>d</sup> the painters

<sup>c</sup> An ancient and fair copy whereof I have seen in the Cottonian library, Julius F. VI. Tract. 103. printed in secretary Burchet's Naval History, as I remember, and in Mr. Lediard's, fol. 337, being here about half a sheet of paper; wherein the earl raises four objections to their conduct in this voyage: first, that they did not possess the Indian fleet: secondly, that they abandon'd Cadiz: thirdly, that they did not wait for the carracks and Indian ships: and lastly, that they did not assail the enemy in their other ports. To all which omissions he makes answer, laying them to the charge of the other commanders; but names Sir Walter Raleigh only in the two last articles. Here we may observe, Sir H. Wotton did either himself mistake the drift of this paper, or, having a courtly pen, would incline his readers to do so. For where he is giving a character of the earl's several employments, and has allowed this at Cadiz to have been the most fortunate, he is further for having it that in which the earl also shewed the greatest modesty; because, says he, there he wrote with his own hand a censure of his omissions: whereas indeed 'tis a censure of his associates, for what Essex imagin'd, how justly let others say, to have been their omissions. Which plainly reverses one of the characters by which that author would distinguish the earl's share in this expedition. See his Parallel of Robert earl of Essex with George duke of Buckingham.

<sup>d</sup> Besides captain Keymis's voyage to Guiana before-mention'd, in which he has spoken, to Raleigh's honour, of the victory at Cadiz; there was another piece printed this year, which I find also dedicated to him; and at this time, before Raleigh was recover'd of the wound he had receiv'd there, with great propriety, in regard to the subject thereof: for it is entitled, A hundred and fourteen Experiments and Cures of the famous physician Phil. Aureol. Theophrastus Paracelsus: To which are added, some profitable works, by B. G. a Portu Aquitano: also the secrets of Isaac Hollandus; and the Spagirie Antidotary for Gun-shot, by Josephus Quercetanus: Collected by John Hester, printed 4to. 1596. This Hester was the learned chymist of Paul's Wharf, whose preparations were famous in other countries as well as his own for many years, as I find in others of his works. But, as I observe in some of them, he is said to have been dead two years before the printer's date of this which he dedicated to Raleigh; and as the title he herein uses, is only To the worshipful Walter Raleigh Esq; I conclude the book was dedicated by Hester to Raleigh before he was knighted, and now seasonably republish'd with a new title-page, or first publish'd from Hester's posthumous Remains, without altering the author's title of his patron. However it is, Hester, in his ingenious dedication upon the motives to the pursuit and improvement of science, tells Raleigh, "Tho' divinity is bounded " with precepts in the old law, and promises in the gospel,

" so that obedience to one and faith in the other is fulfilling of either; yet all other faculties tending to the " government or ornament of life do so carry a privilege " of more liberty in search, and scope in practice, that
" to rest contented with the inventions of others, is as odious
" to the learned, as it is for frank hearts to feed at other
" mens trenchers; or fine wits to be set to tell the clock, " while grosser heads are better employ'd: and not without painters and sculptors, who have appropriated this sea-fight to his portraits; * and those other advancers of the like honorary arts, who, in their discourses of medals and intaglias, have thought him worthy, for this, among his many other actions and excellencies, of that metallic commemoration, which is more usually among us confined to princes and crowned heads. <sup>b</sup>

ABOUT two months after Raleigh's return from the conquest of Cadiz, we find him making a new attempt to continue the interest and correspondence he had so hopefully begun in Guiana. To this end, he mann'd out and stor'd, with all proper conveniences and merchandize for trade and discovery in those parts, a handsome pinnace which had been with him in the late engagement, called after his own name, the Watt. therefore probably one of his own ships. The command of her he committed to captain Leonard Berrie; but, through contrariety of winds, and other accidents, they made it the latter end of December following before they got out of Weymouth. In the beginning of March they discover'd the coast, and fell into the Wiapouco, a river almost in four degrees north of the line, and about sixteen leagues in length; but not being able to find the head of its falls, nor meeting with any of the inhabitants to supply them with provisions, they return'd, and made towards the great town called Aramatto, where they stored themselves to their desire. After this, several of those natives came in canoes, and traded with the English in their ships. Then captain Berrie hired some of them, with a present of knives, to go back unto the river Cawo, and invite the ruler of that place, named Ritimo, on board, who accordingly came to them in the river Chiana, where he and his train were feasted, and traffick'd with the English much to their satisfaction: and thither also flock'd, from their several towns, great numbers of a civiliz'd race of Carribes, who brought great plenty of victuals and tobacco, which they exchange'd for such commodities as the English were well instructed to carry thither. After they had declar'd their unanimous desire to have the English come and rout the Spaniards, take command of the Orenoque, and dwell in the bordering nations, they departed; and the English made away to the Careres, or triangular islands, and kept trading on with the people of the neighbouring towns, who familiarly resorted to them. Then they passed along through the river Marawin, to Quiparia and Macirra, for about forty or fifty leagues upward to the falls of that river, and to the sight of a rich country above, where the people were of an extraordinary stature, and carried bows halfed with gold; but were forced to return without compleating that discovery, for want of provision; tho' my author, one of the adventurers, thought the palmito's, and other trees in the woods, would have supported them till they could have rewarded themselves with what "might have done us good, says he, as long as we had lived." On the 15th of April 1597, they returned from that river, and wander'd through several others; till, about four days after, they fell into the Coritine. In this river they met a bark, called the John of London, commanded by captain Leigh (the same, I suppose, who afterwards made other voyages to Guiana; and took further possession of the country, not by force, the Spaniards title, but consent of the people; tho' for a prince indeed, who deserved no right there which he had not the spirit to maintain.) And falling down some five leagues from the mouth thereof, upon in-

"cause, for by such restraint, wit on the one side sustains too great an injury, in not ranging o'er the fields of nature; and nature too base a disgrace, in not being set forth by wit as she has been; but must be accounted old, which she refuses; or barren, which she abhors. To avoid this inconvenience, examples of antiquity have left several patterns of emulation for posterity to imitate; wherein our age cannot be condemn'd for negligent, as having exceeded the number of writers in any age past; among whom the undertakers in physics have been so numerous, that the bluntest wit cannot complain of scarcity, nor the deepest head of the want of variety." Then he says, out of these writers, he has chosen some, for their merits held in their own country, very dear, to translate for the benefit of his countrymen: and as heretofore he had sought the authority of other patrons; so now he presumes, under the comfortable shield of Raleigh's favour, to shadow this work; beseeching him, out of that bountiful courtesy for which he is so generally commended, to pardon his presumption, and accept of his performance.

* Of the pictures and prints which have been drawn of Sir Walter Raleigh, more will be spoken a few leaves following.

knot on one side, representing a triple league against Spain with this inscription, Rumpitur haud facile; and on the reverse a navy of great ships at sea, under the name of Jehovah, with this Epigraph, Quid me persequeris, 1596. Hence thought by some to have been in memory of the victory at Cadiz; but, as he tells us, it was struck upon the alarm menacing those three nations on the surprize of Calais this year. Therefore where he is speaking of those adventurous Argonauts in these times who deserved the honour of Medals for their exploits at sea, among whom, he reckons chiefly those who found out new worlds, planted colonies, and enlarged the British empire: he adds, I know not whether there was any medals of the earl of Essex's expedition to Cadiz, and of the heroes who accompanied him. So recommends Sir W. Raleigh to that distinction, as being "a person of extraordinary merit for his learning and experience: and who is he, continues my author, that deplores not his being so unhappily cut off (and our since want of such as Raleigh was) to gratify the crafty and malicious?" Further, where he is subsiding from arms to arts, he mentions Raleigh again among the foremost of those illustrious persons, of whom he says, "How should one rejoice to find in more lasting matter than painted cloth, the true effigies of such as were famous for both." Numismata, vol. 1697. p. 99. 160, 161.

telligence that the Dessakebe, with which that river meets, would lead them within a day's journey of the lake Perima, whereon Manoa was supposed to stand, they meant to discover a passage to this rich city. But, having rowed in their boats about fifty leagues from the mouth of the Coritine to the falls of the said river, where, having been credibly inform'd that five days journey further there was a fall impassable; and, finding withal some of the towns bordering thereon so importunate to engage them in wars against their enemies the Waccawaes, which would turn greatly to the disadvantage of the English, when Sir Walter Raleigh should again return thither, because he would have occasion to pass that river, which was reported to have gold in it; they therefore were constrained to return. So, clearing themselves of this coast, they took their course to the islands of the West-Indies. Here my author, who was a gentleman of the company, after having spoke in praise of the climate, how temperate and wholesome it is, tho' within the Tropic, and so near the Equinoctial; as also how docible the natives, and humane (especially to Englishmen) tho' a savage and uncultivated people; he proceeds to speak of their riches in these words. "In the upper countries they go apparel'd, being, as it seems, of a more civil disposition; having great store of gold, as we are certainly inform'd by the lower Indians, of whom we had some gold, which they brought and bought in the high country of Wiana; being able to buy no more, because they wanted the things which now we have left among them." Then, having taken a little further notice of their manners, with the plenty and variety of their provisions, he shews what course his company took homewards, and how they arriv'd safe at Plymouth on the 28th of June following.<sup>b</sup>

Thus have we abstracted, after such manner as in this place may be most pertinent to our purpose, all the voyages Sir Walter Raleigh set forth for discoveries, as well as the warlike expeditions in which he was engag'd, as far as they have been preserv'd in Hakluyt's collections. Nor was it without just reason, that his said naval enterprizes were thus carefully gather'd therein; since Raleigh's encouragement was such, of this extraordinary undertaking, to raise a grove of laurels, in a manner out of the seas, that should overspread the island with glory, and might be still made to shoot more spaciouly afresh, were the author and his work reviv'd in a manner suitable to their deserts,<sup>c</sup> that when even the first edition of these English voyages was published, <sup>a</sup> That there are many rich mines and minerals in Guiana, as well as mountains and rivers impregnate with gold, is not only thus constantly intimated by the English travellers thither of these times, but attested by the Spaniards themselves, in their further discoveries many years after; as may be seen in father D'Acuna's relation of the river of Amazons, and other Spanish authors. But as for the rich city of Manoa, just before spoken of, which they had called El Dorado, it seems now to have been invented by these Indians, as a gilded bait to draw the Spaniards into league with them against their enemies; and propagated by the Spaniards themselves, to enhance the merit of their travels, and sharpen the appetite of their successors to pursue the enterprize; for no such city having been found, it has been reputed a kind of Philosopher's Stone in Cosmography: yet, like that in Chymistry, tho' undiscover'd it felt, it was, and may further be the means of many profitable discoveries. If such a metropolis had been distinctly ascertain'd by Antonio de Herrera, and in John de Laet's excellent accounts and maps of these parts, and had not appear'd doubtful even to father D'Acuna himself; I see not how Monsieur Sanfon, who, in 1680, grav'd a little map to explain the French translation of the said Jesuit's discourse, could have omitted it; and for the new edition, published in 1715, another map was grav'd by Mr. De l'Isle; which, tho' more copious and compleat, is not, as I can hear, more particular in this respect.

<sup>c</sup> For the considerable intelligence we have receiv'd from this Collection of Voyages, it may not be improper here, at parting with, to shew our gratitude towards the laborious author, in a short observation or two, which may somewhat amend what has been said by others of him, and recommend his most laudable work, long since out of print, to a new impression. And, first: This Richard Hakluyt might be of a Horsfordshire family; but whether born there, too doubtful for Fuller to settle him a native of that county. He was sent young to Westminster-school, and became one of the queen's scholars; when visiting his cousin Richard Hakluyt of Eiton, in the said county, at his chambers in the Middle Temple (but never studying the municipal law there, as A Wood mistakes of him, instead of his said cousin) this relation, a great proficient in cosmography, and promoter of navigation, communication, and explaining certain books and maps to him, wrought such impressions in young Hakluyt, that he resolved, if ever he should go to the University, to prosecute these studies. Accordingly, being removed to Christ-Church in Oxford about 1570 (says Wood) he fell to searching after, and reading over, in any of seven languages, all the voyages and discoveries in print or MS. that he could meet with; and became so eminent for these studies, that he was chosen to read public lectures of navigation in the schools, wherein he was the first that shew'd the imperfections of the old, and improvements of the new maps, globes, and other instruments in this branch of science, to the great satisfaction of his auditory. By his further enquiries of this nature, he also became acquainted with the chief sea-officers, merchants and mariners of the nation. At length he travelled to France with Sir Edward Stafford, her majesty's legier ambassador, and resided there five years; during which time, he heard other nations miraculously extoll'd for their discoveries and notable enterprizes at sea; but the English, for their sluggish security and neglect of such attempts, through their long peace, much condemn'd; and not only in common discourse, but read them also more durably branded in the writings of their authors; particularly in La Popliniere's book, called L'Admiral de France; all which animated Hakluyt, at his return into England with the lady Sheffield about the year 1588 (after having published P. Martyr, translated the French discovery of Florida, and before them, duly celebrated Sir W. Raleigh) to stop the mouths of these slanderers, by collecting together the naval achievements of his countrymen; which he perform'd so expeditiously, that by the latter end of 1589, he publish'd a fair volume in Folio of the English navigations, which he dedicated to that great encourager of them, Sir F. Walsingham. The work was so universally approved, that the author was prevail'd on to enlarge and reprint it, which he afterwards did in three volumes; the first two commonly bound together in one book, fol. 1599, and the last fol. 1600. "A work of great honour to England, as Fuller justly observes, it being possible that many ports and islands in America, which are now bare and barren, and known only by a bare name at present, may prove rich places hereafter: and then these voyages will be produc'd, and pleaded as good evidence of their belonging to England, as first discover'd and denominated by Englishmen." The author was made a prebendary of Westminster about the year 1605, and rector of Wetheringset in Suffolk, as Wood tells us; who also mentions his other writings, as his edition of Peter Martyr's book published, and before they could receive any lustre from the Guianian discoveries, the said author, in his preface, acknowledges Sir Walter Raleigh to have been one of those benefactors, from whom he had received his chief light into the western navigations. Nor did he only oblige Hakluyt with communicating divers maritime adventures in which he himself and countrymen were concern'd; but procured for him, at no small expence, some very scarce voyages and discoveries of foreigners which were unprinted; and was moreover at the charge of rewarding some persons of learning and leisure to translate them into English, for the further enrichment of the said collections. One instance of this kind he slightly mentions himself. For in his learned enquiries into the name of the Red sea, he speaks of a voyage made thither by the Portugal viceroy of the East-Indies, named Stephen Gama, the narrative whereof was written by Castro, one of his principal commanders; which discourse, says he, I gave Mr. Richard Hakluyt to publish.<sup>a</sup> Now, tho' I remember not to have met with this discourse in Hakluyt; yet the author, who, after his death, recover'd some of his papers, and continued his undertaking, has given us an abridgment of it, and inform'd us, that the original manuscript had cost Sir Walter Raleigh threescore pounds, who also caused it to be translated out of the Portuguese tongue; and was at the pains of making several corrections of the phrase, and marginal notes upon it, with his own hand.<sup>b</sup> Further, we might expatiate upon this care he had for the preservation of other mens fame; but here a gallant exploit solicits our regard, by which he much increased his own.

For the earl of Effex, grown discontented to see his party of such little power at court, and the Cecilians carry all before them; that he could not advance several of his friends and followers to certain posts in the army, nor even Sir Thomas Bodley to the office of secretary, whom he had perhaps prejudic'd with his prodigal praises to the queen, she having prefer'd Sir Robert Cecyl to that place, in his absence at Cadiz, whom he had as intemperately traduc'd,<sup>c</sup> resolved to seek, by further services abroad, to strengthen that interest at home which he now found so weak and unserviceable; in which, if his experience and discretion had been answerable to the activity and bravery of his spirit, he might not have been disappointed, nor outshin'd in martial expeditions, as he was outwitted in court-intrigues. But he had now a fair opportunity to pursue this scheme. For the king of Spain, enrag'd at the late overthrow and destruction of Cadiz, had immediately thereupon muster'd up the naval powers from all his ports, at Lisbon, for a new expedition upon England and Ireland; but his old enemies the winds and the waves so speedily disabled and dispersed them, that the queen heard of their fate before she had

book de Novo Orbe, with notes. Wherein, as we have before observed, Hakluyt has so highly applauded Sir Walter Raleigh for his advancements of navigation: besides some other things which are chiefly versions from the Portuguese. But the notes of certain commodities in request in the East-Indies, &c. by R. Hakluyt, among Mr. Selden's MSS. at Oxford, I take to be written by the Templar, who has other such discourses, and, I think, this in his kinsman's collections. And whereas the French dissertation on the river of Amazons, prefix'd to M. de Gomberville's translation of father D'Aacuna's relation above-mention'd, has, among other errors relating to Sir Walter Raleigh, said, 'That the history of the second voyage he made in person to Guiana, was written and given us by this celebrated compiler Mr. Hakluyt, in his said collections; out of which history the French author pretends to quote some particulars: We must here observe, this assertion of Hakluyt's writing such a history, is notoriously false; for he died in 1616, which was before Sir Walter Raleigh went his said last voyage to that part of America. All we shall mention more in this place of him is, First, the wishes, that some other such able pen would continue his collections; which may be read in Robert Ashley's dedication to Sir Maurice Abbot, of his Cochin-China; a scarce tract, printed above a hundred years since, and which I have seen in a volume of such other choice pieces among the curious collections of the right honourable the lord Coleraine. Secondly, since to the continuation of such collections, a like term of such brave adventures as are the subject of them, would be requir'd, which may not, in any proportion, be readily produced, that other with, which may be gather'd from Mr. Baban's complaint above forty years ago, in his character of queen Elizabeth, of the scarcity of this collection, that it may, after so long a neglect, be prefer'd to a second impression; in justice to the author, in honour of the heroic examples it commemorates, and for the profit of such imitation as it may inspire.

<sup>c</sup> Sir Thomas Bodley informs us, that before he return'd from the united provinces in 1597, and after, the earl of Effex used him so kindly, that tho' he meant to settle his dependance only on the lord Burghley, as best able, and most willing to work his advancement with the queen; yet the earl, who sought, by all devices, to divert her liking both from the father and the son especially; did often, to withdraw his affection also from both, entertain the queen with prodigal speeches of his sufficiency for a secretary; which were accompanied with such words of disgrace against the latter, "That neither she her self took any great pleasure to prefer me the sooner, says Bodley; for she hated his ambition, and would give little countenance to any of his followers; and both the lord Burghley and his son waxed jealous of my courtes." And a little further, "when I had thoroughly bethought me, first in the earl; of the slender hold-fast he had in the queen; of an endless opposition of the chiefest of our statemen, likely still to wait upon him; of his perillous, feeble, and uncertain advice, as well in his own, as in all the causes of his friends; and when I had fully consider'd how untowardly these two counsellors were affected to me; how ill it became my natural disposition to become a stickler in publick faction; and how well I was able to live of my self, &c. I was resolv'd to take my farewell of state employments, and to retire from court." any advertisement of their design: and as she then took care to fortify such castles as lay most obvious to any such invasion; so now that she heard the storm was gathering again, by the repair of the said shatter'd fleet; and recruits added to it, threatening a new descent upon Ireland, she resolv'd also to recollect her forces by sea. At first indeed, before she was well inform'd of the enemy's strength, she had only arm'd and victuall'd ten of her best ships, and caus'd the Low-Countries to provide the like number under admiral Duvenword. But when the lord Thomas Howard and Sir Walter Raleigh, who were pitch'd upon for the command of this fleet, declared their hopes of doing any great service with it to be weak and uncertain, and the news of the Adelantado's stronger preparations at Feroll and the Groyne were daily confirm'd, a new council was call'd; in which it was resolv'd, that this naval force, which the queen had appointed, was too great for a discovery, and too little for an attempt; as in the earl of Essex's apology is rightly observ'd.<sup>a</sup> Therefore, passing over the addition, so unaccountably deficient in the said apology,<sup>b</sup> that I cannot think him the author both of one and the other, there were added to the first prepared fleet about ten ships more of the royal navy; which, with the other men of war, victuallers, transports, and many stout vessels belonging to the nobles, knights, and gentlemen, who were adventurers in this voyage, amounted to about one hundred and twenty sail, as we are inform'd by Sir Arthur Gorges, an officer in this enterprize, whose most excellent history thereof we shall here principally follow. These ships then being all sufficiently mann'd with sailors, received an army also on board of five thousand soldiers, with ten pieces of artillery for the field, and five hundred volunteers most gorgeously equipp'd. The proportion of victuals was for four months at large allowance, and double apparel both for the soldiers and mariners.<sup>c</sup> The lord-admiral Howard, being indispos'd, declin'd the command; which therefore was granted in chief to the earl of Essex; but the lord Thomas Howard was made vice-admiral, and Sir Walter Raleigh rear-admiral in the expedition; and these three, with four others, made up the council of war. The purpose of this grand preparation was, to defeat and destroy the Spanish fleet aforesaid at Feroll, as well as in other ports of the enemy; also to seize upon such Indian fleets of treasure as they should meet with belonging to the king of Spain; but especially to conquer, retain, and engarrison most of the isles of the Azores; and above all the Tercera: wherefore this enterprize was called the ISLAND VOYAGE.

In the Island Voyage.

Sir Francis Vere, who was marshal again of the army, discovers himself much nettled at the queen's having made the lord Mountjoy lieutenant-general; and cannot forbear exposing his patron Essex's dissingenuity towards that lord, in retrenching him to the mere title of a superior command, rather than not let himself be known to have got the authority of it. And, notwithstanding this, further betrays so much his stomach and jealousy of Essex's consent to that precedence, as to desire the earl would not use him at all hereafter in any action wherein he was to go in chief; yet unreservedly confesses, the earl took these speeches of his as proceeding rather from a passionate discontentment, than a resolution fram'd in cool blood; and with so little sharpness, that when they came to Weymouth, the earl thinking there might remain some grudge of the last year's falling out, caus'd Sir Walter Raleigh and Sir Francis Vere to shake hands: "which we did both, says he, the more willingly, because there had nothing pass'd between us that might blemish reputation."<sup>d</sup>

ABOUT the 9th of July following, the whole fleet set sail from Plymouth, and, for two days, had a fair leading wind; in which time all the ships received their directions from the council of war, with the meeting-places from time to time in case of separation by tempest, fight, chase, or any other accident. But being now advanced about sixty leagues, there arose such an

<sup>d</sup> These islands are situate in the Atlantick, or western ocean, between thirty seven and forty degrees; and distant from England about four hundred leagues. They were so named by the Portuguese, from a kind of hawks, call'd by them Afiro, by the Romans Accipitres, and by us Goshawks; these islands breeding abundance of those birds: tho' Orellana derives the name from a French word, signifying to dry or with, without giving reason for his etymology. They are nine in number, and named

St. Mary's, which is near the coast of Spain; St. Michael's, which is the largest of them, being about twenty miles long; the Tercera, so called, because lying the third from Spain, is the strongest; Gratiosa, from the fertility of the soil, and pleasant temper of the air; St. George's, like the two first, from the saint's name on whose day it was discover'd; the Pike, from the wonderful sharp mountain thereon, which rises steeple-wise three miles high, is six or seven miles in circuit at the base, and reported to have Vulcano's in its bowels, disgorging flakes and stones of fire; Fayall was so call'd from Faya, the beech-tree, which grew in plenty there; Flores, from the abundance of flowers which overspread the island; and Cueiro, from the vast flocks of crows or ravens which were observed to breed therein. See Gorges, as above, also more largely in Linschoten and Hakluyt, vol. 3.

exceeding high storm full in their teeth, and continued with such violence for four days together, that all the ships were driven, with great detriment to several, back into Plymouth; and many died of the sickness it had brought among them. While they lay here wind-bound for a month, and their provisions much damaged and consumed; Essex, in company, as he tells us himself, with Sir Walter Raleigh, rode post to court.<sup>a</sup> The earl was very forward in his proposals to set out again with the fleet as soon as it should be repair'd, or at least one half of it, being sure the Enemy should have felt the weight and charge of the journey. But her Majesty not accepting his offer, it was more advisedly resolved, to proportion their expedition to the opportunities which remain'd; the season being so far elapsed, and their provisions so much exhausted: therefore Essex had orders from her Majesty to discharge the land-forces, all but the thousand Low-Country soldiers, then thought the best and most experienc'd of this army; whereby, tho' they were disabled of disembarking at Feroll, and attacking the enemy there by land; yet Essex offer'd to send certain fire-ships into the bay, and second them with the two Spanish galleons last year taken, with some great flyboats and merchant-men, to destroy their shipping; and leave the queen's own English-built ships at the mouth of the harbour, with a principal commander, to secure their retreat; and this was allow'd of, but with some limitations, as Essex confesses in one place,<sup>b</sup> which in another,<sup>c</sup> we find to be an absolute bar to hazard any other of the ships, and as absolute a restraint of the earl himself from going into the harbour to put this project in practice; but that it should be done by that principal commander he would have left behind; whether through care of his person as a nobleman, or to have it attempted by one of the greatest abilities and experience for such a naval exploit, I cannot say; but Sir Walter Raleigh was prefer'd to the execution of this service, and, as Sir Francis Vere observes, the charge of firing the fleet was undertaken by him.<sup>d</sup>

DURING this absence of Essex and Raleigh at court, which was not above seven days, there fell out such exceeding tempestuous weather as very much distress'd the fleet both in Plymouth-Road and the Catwater; infomuch that one of Raleigh's own ships, named the Roe-buck, of three hundred tons burthen, ran aground, and bulged her self, so became unserviceable for that voyage; tho' much pains and care were taken by all hands, and especially the lord Thomas Howard himself in person, to have preserved her.<sup>e</sup> On the 17th of August following they all weigh'd anchor, and, with much labour, set sail again, being becalm'd; but the weather growing somewhat favourable, they held their course for the North-Cape. Six days afterwards they fell across the bay of Albaster, or Biscay; and at last bore full into it, much to the dislike of Raleigh's pilot, a skilful mariner, named Broadbent, who thought it very perillous for so great a fleet so wilfully to imbay there, and upon an enemy's coast; yet as it was the general's course, they comply'd. The next being Bartholomew-day, they were here for several hours beaten and scatter'd about by a prodigious storm, wherein one of the late taken prizes, named St. Matthew, falling into a head-sea, and having her sprit-sail out, broke her bolt-sprit and fore-mast overboard, close to the partners. The fall of her masts also broke two anchors, and carried the third away; and her main-mast, with her rolling and tumbling, had so loosen'd it self, that it was in danger of breaking in the step, whereby she would soon have been sunk, had not her captain, Sir George Carew, with great resolution and hazard, carried her into England, and exchange'd her for another. In the same storm the other Spanish prize, the St. Andrew, spent her main-top-mast, and lost company for some days; but all the rest of the fleet kept labouring in the bay, till first Raleigh, and some ships of his squadron which happen'd to carry the Low-Country soldiers, clear'd out, and made the best of their way to the next rendezvous, as we shall hear: and afterwards several of the earl's losing him, sail'd thither also in search of him. This gave rise to a misrepresentation by Raleigh's adversaries, that he had designedly withdrawn himself and that part of the fleet; while Essex himself incurr'd a more just censure throughout the whole fleet, by making the high land of Portugal, and bearing in so close to the shore, that he alarm'd all the Country to make defence against him. Afterwards as the fleet, being join'd again, was passing together towards the south, almost as far as the isles of Bayon, Raleigh's ship, the Warspite,<sup>f</sup> being then in the centre of them, on the 27th of

Relation of this voyage, who should indeed well know its name, being captain thereof under Raleigh; yet as I meet not with any ship of the royal navy so named elsewhere, as that which Raleigh was in the last year, at the conquest of Cadiz, was call'd the Warspite; and, as Sir William Monson and others, call that also by this name, in which Raleigh, this year, perform'd the Island Voyage; I conclude the other reading to have been an error of the press.

August broke her main-yard asunder in the very midst by the parrel. This disaster was no Distress'd. sooner made known, than Effex discover'd a greater in his ship, a desperate leak being broke out in her, by which he had much-ado to escape drowning. Here it was agreed, that, till Ralegh's ship should be repair'd, he might keep cruising about the height of the Rock, where they were to unite, and pass to the South Cape; yet the next morning, before that reparation could be made, Ralegh had a message to attend Effex with all speed, that they might put in with the land, which it was impossible for Ralegh to do, being unable to work upon a wind, as having but a fore-sail and mizen, and the wind almost of the land; besides, if he could have made the land with that sail, it was thought a madness to put upon the enemies coast in that condition; when, if the wind should change to the west, he must, in want of his main-sail, have yielded or perished: so found himself necessitated to ply up and down for two days, till the said fraction was mended. In this distress, there was no direction given for any other of the fleet to attend upon Ralegh; yet Sir William Brook in the Dreadnought, out of his friendly disposition, tarried with him; also the vice-admiral himself, lord Thomas Howard, very affectionately offer'd all the assistance he could give; and several other of the sea-captains voluntarily did the like: but Ralegh would admit of no more than three or four small men of war to accompany him; and order'd the rest, even of his own squadron, to repair to the admiral: so far was he from projecting a division of the fleet, by entreating any to forsake Effex and abide with him, as it was afterwards very falsely represented, to incense Effex against Ralegh, for contriving thereby the frustration of their first resolv'd attempt; and as Ralegh himself, when they met at the Azores, so satisfactorily made evident, that the said imputation turned only to the shame of its contrivers.<sup>a</sup>

WHEN Ralegh had repaired the damages of the storm, he bore in with the coast, making all the enquiry he could after Effex and the fleet, but could hear no tidings of them; he sent into the isles of Bayon, and towards the South-Cape, well knowing the earl could not then put into Feroll or the Groyne, as was afterwards colourably pretended he would have done had they united, the wind being flat against him; and the whole fleet having over-shot that coast near twenty leagues before the main-yard of Ralegh's ship was broken; and besides, that they could not recover it again, both those Spanish prizes were wanting which only were to have been ventured in the Service. Hereupon Ralegh shaped his course to the Rock, which was appointed for the general rendezvous; expecting, not only with good reason, to meet Effex there, but with great desire; his own force being so small, and the enemy, as he heard, out at sea with a powerful fleet. Yet those who could suspect Ralegh would prefer a separation, dangerous and disadvantageous as it was now, would needs have had it thought there was much more reason for that suspicion, when there came to Ralegh at the Rock near thirty sail more, most of them his own victuallers and transports; but the truth is, that having lost Effex during the storm in the bay, and missed him also at the North-Cape, they came hither according to their instructions; where, casually meeting with Ralegh, he held them together, and conducted them to Effex at the Islands: otherwise they had all return'd home, after they had failed at the South-Cape, which was the third and last meeting-place, of some admiral to command them, and of whom they would have fail'd, since none of the fleet went so far southward.

SOON after he had determin'd, in search of the fleet, to pass on towards the South-Cape, he was travers'd by an English bark, which assur'd him they had learn'd from an English man of war which had lately taken an India-man, that the Adelantado was gone for the Islands to convoy the Indian fleet safe home. This seeming very probable, and no one suspecting that any of their countrymen would traiterously delude her majesty's fleet with any false informations in a pursuit of this consequence, Ralegh earnestly besought the captain of the said bark to hunt after Effex, and apprise him of this intelligence: but he answer'd, in the hearing of the whole company, that the captain, who had taken that India man, had already sent a letter to Effex thereof. Ralegh, doubting it might have miscarried, or that none was sent, commanded one of the small men of war attending upon himself with all diligence to seek out the fleet, and make report of what they had heard. This ship, by good chance, met with the fleet next day, and deliver'd

a few lines further, there were other accidents besides, which hindered them from landing at Feroll; and these also are acknowledg'd by Effex, in that relation of this voyage which is subscribed by himself and his council of war before-named: See Purchas, vol. 4. fol. 1936. Sufficient, in the whole, to clear Ralegh, both from the censure of any wilful desertion, and, consequently, for not putting in execution the first intended assault.

the news. Two days after, Raleigh received two letters from Effex, which, somewhat taxing his absence, and not writing, requir'd that he would presently follow him to the Islands: "Where" unto (the earl said) he was hastening to find the Adelantado; not doubting but to give his
" mistress a better account of that service, than he should yield his master."

In passing to the Islands, Raleigh encounter'd many new difficulties, by which he was so much in danger of losing his main-mast, that he was forced to send the ships in his company before, because he thought Effex might be in want of them, if he should meet the enemy; and, if they had joined the fleet without Raleigh, who was principally depended on, in case of any engagement, it would have much strengthened the misconstructions that had been nourished against him; but Raleigh so speedily and effectually repaired his crazy mast, and so briskly ply'd his sails, that he overtook his comforts next day, and on the eighth of September they all made the island of Tercera; yet here could they meet with no news of the fleet, tho' they enquired of an English merchant who had traded about these Islands above six weeks, and tho' it had passed that way but two days before. By this merchant Raleigh wrote into England, to acquaint the state in what situation they were; then passed on to St. George's island, where they found the weather exceedingly hot, and were vexatiously becalm'd for a day or two, before they could get foward to Gratiosa. Here, as they coasted along, on the tenth of September about midnight, they saw a large and perfect rainbow by moon-light, in the shape and bigness of those formed more commonly by the sun, tho' in colours not so various, but chiefly inclining to a pale or whitish flame: this made the generality of the seamen expect some extraordinary tempestuous weather; but it fell out, on the contrary, to be very calm and hot.<sup>a</sup> The same night they also espied, by the light of the moon, then upon the border of the horizon, some sail of ships gliding towards the east of Gratiosa; at which Raleigh hung out two lights for his company to follow him in chase of them; but they not taking his course, and the moon being soon after quite shadow'd and intercepted by the earth, he was left in darkness and solitude, having lost all sight both of the new-discover'd ships, and those of his own company, till, in the space of four days more, a leisurely breeze of wind brought him, after all these impediments, to the rest of the fleet, then gather'd at the isle of Flores.

fleet.

As soon as Raleigh had descry'd the fleet, he took his barge, and, with our author Sir Arthur Gorges, as also some other of the officers and gentlemen in his company, went aboard the earl of Effex's ship, with whom they all din'd; and "who seem'd, says Gorges, to be the joyfullest
" man living for our arrival;" protesting, that "he never believ'd we would leave him, al" tho' divers perswaded him to the contrary;" and acknowledg'd, "that he was sorry for a " letter which he had written, by Mr. Robert Knolles, into England against us;<sup>b</sup> promising " presently to make a dispatch on purpose, contrary to the former." Further, when Effex had fully satisfied himself, that all the transports and victuallers which returned with Raleigh, had not been inveigled away by him; and how commendably he had thus drawn them to the Islands, against their inclinations, being, most of them, in great distress; he open'd himself to him in a very amicable and communicative manner. He told him, "how he had spent the " time of their separation wholly in ranging the seas to meet with the Adelantado;" he acquainted him with "the many conjectures and surmises that had been vented of his absence, and,
" withal, named to him some of those men who had taxed him secretly with strange reports,
" yet pretended to love him; which he protested he never believ'd, but thereby the better ob-

<sup>a</sup> This rainbow by the light of the moon, is the rather to be observed, because Pliny, in his Natural History, speaking of meteors, denies any rainbow to be seen, but opposite to the sun, and never in the night-season; yet tells us, Aristotle reports, for a rarity, that in his time there was a nocturnal rainbow seen; but, withal, that it could only be at the full of the moon. Nevertheless, in these parts, they are very ordinary, as well when the moon is not at full, as otherwise: for no longer than a week after this time, Raleigh and his company observed another lunar rainbow, as they rode at anchor before Flores; and there could not be two full moons in seven days, which makes it probable these islands were not known to the Greeks and Romans, or those meteors not sufficiently observed by them.

<sup>b</sup> Tho' Sir Arthur Gorges does a little further both repeat the sending of this message into England, as if it was, in very strong terms, against Sir Walter Raleigh; and also Effex's promise to him, that he would now send another of Recantation; which promise giving some satisfaction to Raleigh, and the message into England being perceptibly sent to colour over the disappointment of his promise to the queen; "wherefore we shrove the less to publish our " Apologies, says Gorges, or to contest with a man of Effex's

" place and credit; but left him to his best excuse and our " apparent innocence." Yet in the copy of that message, or instructions to Mr. Knolles, which my said author exhibits verbatim, this absence of Raleigh's (and consequently that omission against the enemy) is no ways laid to his charge, or mention'd as any fault or contrivance of his; all the words that express the same, being these: "If her " majesty ask you, why there was no attempt upon the " fleet at Ferrol? You may say, I neither had the St. Ma- " thias, the principal ship for that execution, nor the " St. Andrew, till my own ship was almost sunk; and I " not able to make sail, till Sir Walter Raleigh with his " own ship, the Dreadnought, and very near twenty sail, " were gone." So that the messenger was further instructed, it seems, to expound this part of his message to Ra- leigh's disadvantage, by word of mouth; for this supposition will render Effex's promise to Raleigh requisite, of sending another advertisement how they were all met again, and had been formerly separ'd by Misfortunes only, and not by any wilful default in the rear admiral, as was doubted

“ferv’d their scandalous and canker’d dispositions.” In this manner did the earl of Essex receive and welcome Sir Walter Raleigh with the greatest kindness and familiarity, as well as all the gentlemen of his company; to the great dislike and heart-burning of some, who much envied that liking, which, of his own disposition, Essex bore to Raleigh: For tho’ the earl had many doubts and jealousies buzz’d into his ears against him; yet I have often observ’d (says Gorges) How much esteem’d by Essex. that both in his greatest actions of service, and in the times of his chiefest recreations, he would ever accept of his counsel and company, before many others who thought themselves more in his favour.

’Tis true, the earl, of his own unperverted nature, was a man, prone to gracious and generous principles; but no less easily blown up to prejudice and indignation against his real friends, by his pretended ones; whence we may conceive, as Sir Arthur Gorges has well observ’d, upon giving an instance of his moderation and bounty to some of these islanders, Tho’ he was endowed with many good gifts, how it came to pass, that he at last fail’d in the use of them.

HERE, as they lay before the isle of Flores, they held a council of war, to conquer and possess, or lay waste some of these islands; they being the chief places of retreat and refreshment for the king of Spain’s Indian fleets, by the treasures whereof his boundless ambition so much disturbed and tyranniz’d over Europe. In this council, the admirals and commanders had their charge allotted, after the following manner. Essex and Raleigh were to undertake the island of Fayall; the lord Thomas Howard and Sir Francis Vere were to secure Gratiosa; the lord Mountjoy and Sir Christopher Blunt were to attempt St. Michael’s; and the Netherland squadron The enterprize allotted him and Essex. was quarter’d to Pike,<sup>a</sup> where grew the greatest store of wines, therefore presumed no unwelcome portion to them. And these places were the first resolved upon, that they might afterwards attack the Tercera it self; for Raleigh’s arrival, contrary to all mens expectations, and many mens hopes, gave their resolution upon this stronger island a second life; but it was first thought expedient to strengthen and supply themselves with whatsoever those weaker ones would afford: and to this end the fleet was divided into four squadrons.

BUT Raleigh’s mariners having obtained leave to go ashore at Flores, to water and furnish themselves with such other necessaries as they wanted; while he himself, attended by several other of the commanders and gentlemen, walk’d a mile or two into the island to stretch their legs and refresh themselves, where they all dined in a little village, the bare-legg’d governor having caused such fare to be brought them as the country afforded, which they very honourably paid for, without offering them the least injury; because the earl had before given them an indemnity, under his own hand, from all manner of violence: when Essex, impatient to be in action, all of a sudden, and before the sailors could get their casks of fresh water aboard, sent, on the 16th of September, captain Arthur Champenon to tell them, “That the general was borne up for Fayall, meaning presently to take it in; therefore required them to follow him instantly; and tho’ they should not overtake him, yet to find him there as soon as they could, and there they might supply their wants.” Hereupon they hasten’d away, with all the sail they could make, after him; but no general could they overtake. The next morning they got sight of Fayall, and miss’d of Essex also there, to their great dissatisfaction, he being six leagues nearer that island when he sent for them, and set sail thither six or eight hours before them. Loses the earl’s company.

BEING enter’d the road, they beheld before them a very fine town, pleasantly seated along the shore; from whence the people, upon sight of their ships, began to pack away both bag and baggage: their friars, nuns, other women and children, they also sent away in carts and carriages: so continued transporting all up into the country for two days together. There was besides a strong fort at one end of the town, and another on the top of a very high mountain near adjoining, by nature very inaccessible, and artificially fenced with flankers, rampiers, and a ditch; also six pieces of artillery, and two hundred Spaniards in garrison; not reckoning others quarter’d about the island. They fir’d upon Raleigh’s ships as he anchor’d in the road, tho’ without much damage, and set a great red standard up in defiance before his eyes. They sent moreover six companies with their colours to entrench upon the shore, in order to oppose his landing. However Raleigh, in his barge, accompanied with Sir Arthur Gorges and captain William Morgan, rowed close along the shore-side, and by the high fort towards the town, to Arrives at Fayall.

<sup>a</sup> Sir Francis Vere, and Camden, misled by the MS. of his Commentaries, inform us, “The general only, with his squadron, was to go to Fayal; and Sir Walter Raleigh, with him, either to the Pike or St. George’s island.” But it seems not likely, that Raleigh should have a command in chief, which he might execute, with approbation of the council, in one place; yet incur all their displeasure, by usurping that of the general in another. But the disadvantageous representation which Vere has given of Raleigh, in the sequel of this action, may pretty well direct us how we should credit his introduction to it.

acquaint himself with the most proper place for making a descent when Effex should arrive; from whence they were saluted with divers musket-shot, which they very fortunately escap'd, having with them neither targets nor armour for their safeguard.

Calls a council of war.

UPON these provocations, and the want they grew in of those necessities, wherewith they were both lately hurried from accommodating themselves, and promis'd they should be supplied here; Raleigh called a council of the captains and officers to consult about taking of the town, if Effex arriv'd not; thinking it a shame to forbear so fair a prize, so near at hand, till they had carried all off; especially since the enemy had begun the war upon them, and so proudly dared them to their own defence. Further, these bravadoes, with the hopes of wealth in this goodly town, and the ransom of houses and prisoners, made all the mariners and soldiers not only ready to mutiny that they were so long restrain'd; but reflect on their commanders, as if this forbearance was the effect only of their fear. And what made them the more eager was, that they saw no likelihood of other benefit by this voyage, than what was thus to be gotten ashore. Notwithstanding these murmurs, and that they heard no news of Effex in two days, the council was divided; and some of the captains who were his most flattering and servile dependants, as Sir Guilly Merrick,<sup>a</sup> Sir Nicholas Parker, and others, were by no means for landing without his knowledge; but Raleigh, with Sir W. Brook, Sir A. Gorges, Sir W. Harvey, and many other commanders and gentlemen of his own squadron, were of a contrary opinion; judging the general would repute them idlers and cowards to lie so long before so good a town with so many ships and men, and do nothing, but let them convey away their effects. This was the general voice both of the land and sea-forces; yet the violent persuasions of Merrick did so prevail, that they agreed to delay the enterprize one day longer; when, if the earl did not come, they all agreed to land together.

Now, the wind tacking about, somewhat unfit for the road they lay in, Raleigh, and divers of his squadron, with many other of the ships after him, weigh'd, and coasted about the point to the north-west side of the island, some four miles further from the town than they were before, and there let fall their anchors, being a better road than the first, as the wind sat. But Merrick, with some five or six ships of his comforts, would not advance with them. They were now in the fourth day of their arrival before Fayall, and no general appear'd; but the prospect of a most inviting country, full of little villages and fruitful fields, which sharpen'd the general desire of landing, to supply their want of victuals, and especially of water, wherewith they had not been recruited since their first setting out from Plymouth; therefore, by agreement, they mann'd out a barge, a long-boat and pinnace, with threescore muskets and forty pikes, rather to guard themselves in watering, than in expectation of any encounter from the town or forts on the other side of the island. But they were no sooner ready to put off from the ships, than they discover'd six ensigns of foot, and some dozen horse-men, marching down speedily from the town and forts to meet them; and made such haste, that they soon possess'd the trenches towards the shore where the English lay, and where, with brandishing swords, and waving colours, they stood daring them to a rencounter. Hereupon, Raleigh found it necessary to augment his force, which Brook, Harvey, and other sea-officers, readily supply'd, to the number of one hundred and sixty men more. Then said Raleigh to them, "seeing these Spaniards and " Portuguese are so gallant to seek or follow, and keep us from watering, we will try our fortunes with them, and either win our landing, or gain a beating." As Raleigh then rowed along by his ships, he was greeted by Bret, Sidney, White, Berry, and other captains of the Low-Country soldiers, who call'd out and advis'd him, "to take them and some of their companies with him; for, if he ventur'd to make the shore only with mariners and his own attendants, without their land-soldiers, he might receive a discreditable repulse." But Raleigh excus'd himself, saying, "he did not know for what service the earl might design them; therefore was resolv'd, with his own company, to make the descent, and then should send for their recruits; by which he would undertake to lodge them that night in the town, and the next in the forts: besides, he was willing to make the attempt with those of his own squadron, that neither the general nor his train should have cause to be ashamed of them for undertaking that in the face of their enemies, which they durst not of themselves follow and perform."

<sup>a</sup> This Guilly Merrick of Hanfcard in Pembrokeshire, the son of Roveland Merrick, Bishop of Bangor, who died 1566; was knighted by Effex at the sack of Cadiz, and one of his creatures and evil counsellors, as Camden has observed. Inasmuch, as having been a busy pro-motor and partaker of the said earl's treasons, he receiv'd the reward which is richly due to all such-like sowers of great mens pride, passions and prejudices, between three and four years after this time, at Ybourn.

THEN Raleigh, having thus a party of two hundred and threescore men, not half the number of the enemy, made forward; and while some ordnance, he had judiciously placed before him in pinnaces, as close along the shore as they could lie, were beating upon their trenches, he rushed through or under them as fast as his oars could ply to the landing-place; which was guarded first with a mighty ledge of rocks, some forty paces long into the sea, and afterwards trench'd and flank'd with earth and stone, having only a narrow lane between two walls left for their entrance. But now, as they approached still nearer to the shore, the enemies shot flew down so thick among them, that not only several of the common men, but of those who would before have passed for very forward and valiant leaders, were much dismay'd; insomuch that Raleigh, who most gloriously approv'd himself no less their chief in courage, than he was in command, did not spare openly to rebuke them aloud with many reproachful words. At last, when he saw them still linger, through consternation, as much to their danger as their disgrace, he commanded, with a loud voice, his watermen to row his own barge full upon the rocks, and bad as many as were not afraid, to follow him. Hereat some boats ran in with us (says my author) and out of them were landed Mr. Garrett, then a pensioner, afterwards earl of Kildare, Sir W. Brook, Sir W. Harvey, Sir John Scott, Captain Henry Thynne, Captain White, Captain Arthur Radford, Captain W. Morgan, Mr. Duke Brook, Mr. Thomas Rudgeway, Mr. Walter Chute, Mr. Henry Allen, Mr. Charles Mackart, and divers other gentlemen. So, clambering over the rocks, and wading through the water, he made his way pell-mell, through all their fire, with shot, pike and sword, up to the narrow entrance; where he so resolutely pursued his assault, that the enemy, after a short resistance, gave ground; and, when they saw his forces press faster and thicker upon them, suddenly retiring, they cast away their weapons, and betook themselves to the hills and woods. The like also did those who were intrench'd higher: and thus did he win this difficult and dangerous landing, together with the trenches of the enemy. A few of his men indeed were drowned and slain, more hurt, and a couple of long-boats sunk; yet was not his loss so considerable as to detract from the justice of those congratulations which were paid him by the officers of the Low-Country forces, when, with some of their companies, they arrived upon the island, and found the footing he had won so strongly fortify'd and guarded.

His dangerous descent.

And superior courage.

Climbs the rocks.

Wins a landing and the trenches.

RALEGH, thus recruited, being now near five hundred strong, thought best to go through with the matter, and prepare the town in readiness for Essex. Therefore, he appointed Bret to the office of serjeant-major, directed the other captains to advance their colours, marshal the companies, and so, in order, marched to the town, about four miles distant from the landing-place. In their passage divers of the enemy, who had before braved them with the greatest insolence, came with white napkins at the end of staves, and voluntarily abased themselves to offices of the greatest servility. There was indeed a way, two miles about, by which they might have passed to the town, and avoided the high fort where the Spaniards lay in garrison. But Raleigh, considering the trouble of their march, the sultry heat of the weather, the hazards of delay, and, above all, the necessity they were under of immediate supplies, took the shortest course; resolving to bring fort and town all into one day's work. Thus, at the head of about forty gentlemen of the best rank, Raleigh led on the companies in a gentle regular manner, full in the face of the fort, having only his leading-staff in his hand, and no other armour on but his collar, for which he was somewhat censur'd by his friends; for, when they came within reach of the fort, they were shrewdly encounter'd with several fierce storms of great and small shot, which came thundering down upon them from all parts of it, wounding several, killing some, and putting most of his men into disorder: insomuch that Raleigh himself, with his little vanguard, was no sooner pass'd, and enter'd under the covert of their trenches and barricadoes at the declivity of a little hill, but the rest, composing the main body of his forces, which, till now that they found themselves under the mercy of the enemies fire, advanced in good order, begun to break their ranks, and, from marching, fell to running on in a straggling and confus'd manner till they were under the walls and trenches almost as soon as their leader,

Marches to the high fort.

<sup>a</sup> Among the rest, there was one captain William Morgan, a brave old soldier, in this march; who, being reproved by our author, Sir A. Gorges, for coming to the field only in his doublet and hose, without either armour or target, answer'd, That his flesh was of musket-proof. Immediately after a musket-ball struck him point-blank upon his belly, and, with the force of its own blow, fell flat at his feet, leaving only a black spot or bruise upon his skin;—thanks to the buckle that join'd his girdle; deserving to be repositied among those trophies in the temple of Mars, which witness he wants not one brother-soldier's impenetrable suit of mail, nor the seven-fold shield of another, who can encounter his enemy behind the curtains only of a pair of proverbs, attesting How little armour will suffice, that is well-plac'd; and, How much fortune favours the bold.

who came some twelve-score yards before them in a steady and deliberate march. Raleigh was somewhat moved to see this tumultuous and timorous course; and more, to think that the enemy saw themselves were the occasion of it; therefore he cry'd out to Bret, Berry, and other captains, demanding, "If these were the men that should have done him such service in landing, and saved him from dishonour? or this the manner of their Low-Country troops, to shew such base cowardice at the first sight of an enemy, and at the musket-shot so far off from a fort?" The captains, who were themselves brave enough, knowing the truth would be the best apology, answer'd, "That these companies who had behaved themselves with such irresolution, were indeed men taken out of Flushing and Brill, the cautionary towns; so were raw soldiers, who had ever lived in a safe garrison, and seldom or never seen an enemy, or encounter'd with shot in the field."

BEING thus got under covert of the trenches and walls which the Spaniards had abandon'd, and retired to their fortifications on the top of the hill, Raleigh commanded captain Bret to appoint a serjeant or two, with a few shot, to go view and discover the way to the town, which, in many places, lay open, as well to the high-fort here in the way towards it, as to the other fort at the end thereof: and where the ways were fenced, they were still more dangerous; it being with low-piled walls of loose ragged stones, which Raleigh justly suspected would increase, rather than obstruct the mischiefs of their enemies artillery. Bret brought word of a general unwillingness in the lieutenants and serjeants to undertake this discovery, so much under the command of the fort and hill; and that the troops were rather desirous of slipping by, in the most hasty, dispersed and unobserved manner they could; which Raleigh would by no means suffer, through consideration of their safety, without urging the regard he had to their credit in this enterprize; for being by this time well inform'd, the island could raise a thousand armed men, and, reasonably believing they would gather their greatest strength for the defence of their best town, towards which he was now marching, he concluded they would have it more in their power to defeat him, advancing in little disorderly and scatter'd parties, than in a regular united body. Bret did make some offer himself to go and survey these passages, if he should be expressly commanded; but indeed it was found he could not be wanted, or spared among his own raw and unexperienc'd troops.

valour.

WHEN Raleigh, therefore, saw all men so scrupulous of this undertaking, and especially those garrison-soldiers, he told them, "That he would not offer that to any man which he would himself refuse: that tho' it were not the duty and office of a chief commander to undertake so ordinary a service, but what duly appertained to the inferior officers and soldiers; and, notwithstanding (said he) that I could therefore enforce others to do it, they shall well perceive that I myself will do that which they dare not attempt; wherein I am ashamed on their behalf, that our general and we are all thus abused in our opinion of these Low-Country soldiers." Then he called for his cuirass and his cask, and said, "he would both go view the way for them, which they made so nice of, as also the passages and ascents to the hill-top; and, as well as he could, observe the strength and fortifications thereof, for their better direction the next morning." Hereupon, captain Berry was very ready to go, "and earnestly desired me (says our author) to divert our rear-admiral from undertaking it; and I thereupon (continues he) did openly dissuade him, who commanded in chief, from putting his own person to these inferior offices of hazard, fitter for a lieutenant or serjeant, than himself, to perform; knowing that all the direction, as well of those troops, as also of a whole squadron of the navy, did, at that time, only rest upon him, in the absence of the admiral and vice-admiral. Notwithstanding he was obstinate therein; as well in scorn of those who had refused, as also, indeed, out of a desire to be better inform'd of the strength and fortifications of the high fort. When I saw him resolved, I told him that I would, out of the love of a kinsman in particular, and also out of an honest regard, take such part as he did, from whom I had received many kind favours, and accompany him; but not out of any great desire I had to go about a piece of work, which consisted of much danger, and little honour in the performance. He thanked me for my offer, but yet wished me not to go, if it were against my will; notwithstanding I accompanied him, and so did some eight or ten more of our servants and followers. But I say truly, and so afterwards it was much spoken of, that there was not any one more of quality that did accompany him in that business."

discovery.

In this manner, and with this number, did Raleigh in person go; the only one, it seems, who despaired not of success, to discover the ascents to the hill; the cannon-shot of the enemy, and thereby the stones of the batter'd walls, flying on every side thick about him all the while. He still proceeded, with an undaunted pace, to compass this knowledge of the safest way by which he

he was to lead the rest, tho' he perceived wounds and death dealt on either hand, and his own danger at every step, more unavoidable. Some of his company, in the march, were hurt, and two had their heads taken from their shoulders; Sir Arthur Gorges had his left leg shot through with a musket-ball, who, without remembering any pain it gave him, observes the bullet burnt both his silk stocking and buskin, as if they had been singed with a hot iron. "I was then hard by the rear-admiral (continues he) who also was shot through the breeches and doublet-sleeves in two or three places. And still they ply'd us so fast with small-shot, that, as I well remember, he wished me to put off a large red scarf which I then wore; being, as he said, a very fair mark for them. But I, not willing to do the Spaniards so much honour at that time, tho' I could have wished it had not been on, answer'd the rear-admiral again, That his white scarf was as eminent as my red; and therefore I would now follow his example."

And narrow escape.

HAVING, by this time, made a sufficient discovery, both of the way for his troops to pass, as also of the avenues to the high fort on the mountain, which he intended to attempt, after he had secur'd the town; captain Berry, with Allen, and some others, advanced to him. Hereupon he sent some guides to captain Bret, with orders for him also to march up with the companies, that they might unite before they came to the town, because he there expected an engagement; or, at least, some salley out of the fort at the end thereof, which they must needs pass before they could get at the town; and which seem'd to threaten resistance, being a very fine fortification, all of stone-work, with curtain, flankers, and ditch, very artificially cast. But immediately, upon Raleigh's approach with the body of his men, the Spaniards, it seems, abandon'd it; for when he enter'd it, he found they were newly departed. In like manner, as he marched on, he found the inhabitants had also forsaken the town, and left him in possession of it, with such wares and stores as could not suddenly be remov'd. Thus, tho' with much danger indeed, and some loss of about half a score men, with the hurt of little above double that number, Raleigh made himself master, in effect, of the whole island; which supply'd him, from his own experience, with an example to confirm the assertion, he afterwards took occasion to maintain, and which we have, in part, touch'd upon before; alledging, That a Country cannot prevent an enemy's fleet from landing its army, without as good a fleet to oppose it.<sup>a</sup> And this example, in his own summary account, we have here subjoin'd, as what may give the reader a double satisfaction, both in confirming the veracity of that which has been here extracted thereof from Sir Arthur Gorges, and adding to the many other instances of Raleigh's modesty and restriction, who could, in the recital of this action, be so much less particular in the brave steps he took to this victory, with the dangers and difficulties he surmounted by sea and land, than that honourable historian has been, who was a witness of them.

"<sup>a</sup> The difficult landing of our English, says Raleigh, at Fayal, in the year 1597, is alledg'd against this: which example moves me no way to think, That a large Coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal myself; and therefore ought to take notice of this instance—There were, indeed, some in that voyage, who advis'd me not to undertake it, and I hearken'd to them somewhat longer than was requisite; especially whilst they desired me to reserve the title of such an exploit, though it were not great, for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty, I gave them to understand the same which I now maintain, That it were more difficult to defend a Coast than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more ease than I did; yea, without finding any resistance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea, even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashness, I may say, I had more regard of reputation in that business than safety: for, I thought it belonging to the honour of our prince and nation, that a few islanders should not think any advantage great enough against a fleet set forth by Q. ELIZABETH. And further, I was unwilling that some Low-Country captains, and others, not of my own squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselves with a sweet conceit (tho' it would have been short, when I had landed in some other place) That, for want of their help, I was driven to turn tail. Therefore, I took with me none but men assured, commanders of my own squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other gentlemen volunteers, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir W. Brook, Sir W. Harvey, Sir A. Gorges, Sir John Scott, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henry Thynne, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Wat. Chute, Marcellus Throgmorton, captain Laurance Keymis, captain William Morgan, and others;

such as well understood themselves and the enemy, by whose help, with God's favour, I made good the enterprise I undertook. As for the working of the sea, the steepness of the cliffs, and other troubles, that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made five or six companies of the enemy, who sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall where their musketeers lay on the rest for us, and won the place of them without any great loss. This I could have done with less danger, so that it should not have served for example of a rule that failed even in this example. But the reasons before alledged, together with other reasons well known to the gentlemen above-named, tho' more private than to be here laid down, made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the shortest course; having it still in my own power to fall off when I should think it meet. 'Tis easily said, the enemy was more than a coward, which was more than we knew; neither will I magnify such a small piece of service, by seeking to prove him better; whom, had I thought equal to my own followers, I would otherwise have dealt with. But, for so much as concerns the proposition in hand, he that beheld this, may well remember, that the same enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the shore; that many of our men were slain or hurt by him, among whom, Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such as, thinking all danger was past when we had won good footing, would needs follow us to the town, were driven by him to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselves to a hasty trot." So he ends the curious digression which introduced this example, with advice to employ, against those that should assail us, our good ships on the sea, and not trust to any intrenchment upon the shore. History of the World, lib. 5. cap. 1. sect. 9.

THIS town, of which Raleigh was thus possess'd, was called Villa Dorta, as I find in Lin. schoten; who also informs us, the people were mostly of the Dutch offspring, yet using the Portuguese language. Others, who likewise describe it, reckon that it contain'd, even some years before this time, at least five hundred houses, built all of stone, with tiled roofs, and disposed into fine streets; besides a handsome church, nunnery, and friery; interspers'd with many pleasant gardens of delicate fruits, and wells of fresh water: insomuch that, for bigness, it has been compar'd to Plymouth or Yarmouth; but, in situation, to Dover; and might probably now have been of as good advantage to Sir Walter Raleigh, as it was, eight years before, to the earl of Cumberland,<sup>a</sup> had he not, in compliment to the earl of Essex, oblig'd himself to so disadvantageous a delay in the conquest of it. However, because the town was unwall'd, and he was to expect, if he lay there open and carelessly refreshing himself, while his soldiers were scatter'd about in quest of provisions, he might easily be surpriz'd, without some good orders and directions given before they fell to rest and repast, he issued forth, at his entrance, a proclamation, that none should straggle twenty-score yards from the town, without leave of an officer, and then go upon their guard, with fit weapon and company. He then made some strong barricadoes; planted a good watch in proper stations, and a strong corps de garde in the market-place, that others might, in safety, bring together such booty as the inhabitants had left behind.

THUS, having refreshed and repos'd themselves all night, the next morning, being the twenty-second of September, even before break of day, they discover'd, bearing in with full sail towards the road of Fayal, the earl of Essex and his fleet; he having been, all this while, making a kind of wild-goose chase after Indian fleets, and the Adelantado, who, it seems, never stirr'd out to sea this year; with other-like uncertain adventures. Now, Sir Guilly Merrick, Sir Christopher Blount, Sir Anthony Shirley, and some other fatal friends and cherishers of the earl's infirmities, soon interrupted, by their aggravating and distorted representations, all Raleigh's further intentions to secure the island. They presently possess'd his lordship's head, that Raleigh had taken this opportunity to play over his parts, and shew the world how well he could act the conqueror, only to steal honour and reputation from the general; and they knew the earl's temper was as ready, as tinder, to catch fire at the least spark of any such suggestion: for, as no man alive was a more passionate courtier of fame, or more desirous to be reputed matchless for magnanimity and enterprize; so none was more jealous of rivals than Essex, or could less endure that any man should obscure his glory, how highly soever he might otherwise be in his favour.<sup>b</sup> But in divers other disagreeable colours, this gallant action was further disfigur'd to the earl, as the contempt and violation of authority; from whence they infus'd, that the presumption of landing such forces without his lordship's leave, was not to be pass'd over without severe punishment; and that it was fit a court-marshal should be call'd, to censure the offence and breach of order and discipline. In short, the unpardonable crime was, that Raleigh dar'd to render himself more conspicuous than any body else. And he had been less culpable, had he been less successful; they seeming rather willing to have endur'd blame for any ill success which might have occur'd to him by their absence and restraint of aid, than allow of any praise for his being victorious without them. Nay, there were not wanting some, among Essex's commanders, who would needs shew the violence of their zeal for his lordship in such extreams, as to throw out, that Raleigh was well worthy of losing his head for his labour. All which might well inspire those solid and durable exposures which he has, in several places, made of such envious and insolent usage.<sup>c</sup>

ESSEX,

<sup>a</sup> In a brief relation of the several voyages undertaken in person by, or at the charge of George Clifford, earl of Cumberland; gather'd by Purchas into his fourth volume: we have it affirm'd, page 143, that in 1589 the earl took this town; that he shipped, from the platform, 58 pieces of iron ordnance; and that he had a ransom paid him of 2000 ducats, mostly in church-plate: but the fortification, which he raz'd, was now new-built, and more strongly fortify'd, being the high fort on the hill, by which Raleigh made his dangerous passage, as is above related.

<sup>b</sup> "And that this is true (continues Sir A. Gorges) those who understood his humour best, cannot justly deny; which, I protest, I do not speak either out of any neglect of one that is dead, or to pick thanks of any that lives; but simply out of a resolution to write an impartial truth, or else be silent. For those spirits that base flattery or servile fear doth transport, in fashioning their histories, are, of all others, to be reputed the unworthiest and most pernicious in a well pollicy'd commonwealth; for we see that those heathens who have written the Stories of Cyrus, Pyrrhus, Alexander, Hannibal, Scipio, Cesar, and all other great kings and renowned heroes, do as well tax them for their vices, as glorify them for their virtues: for who lives without fault? And so sincerely and boldly do they follow the truth in their writings, that they are thereby freed from malice or revenge, because they are free from all partiality; or, if any spleen arise, yet it is secret; for the prosecution of such sincerity, is reputed mere impiety in all sorts, and flat tyranny in princes. And, to conclude; this impotent humour of enduring rivalry, and other mens praises, is very incident to men in high places; especially, if they are of great courage, or tickled with ambition."

<sup>c</sup> "There are multitudes of men (says Raleigh) especially of those that follow the war, who both envy and malign others, if they perform any praise-worthy actions for the honour and safety of their own country, tho' themselves may be assured to bear a part of the smart of contrary success; and such malicious hearts can rather be contented that their prince and country should suffer hazard and want, than that such men as they dislike should be the authors or actors of any glory or good to either." Hist. of the World, lib. 2. cap. 13. sect. 5. And in another place he has this reflexion — "In actions which promise either publick glory or private honour,

Essex, thus exasperated, spent all the forenoon in reprehending, displacing and confining all the land-captains and officers who accompanied Raleigh; whilst he, expecting rather thanks, than such a perverse interpretation of his services, made ready his barge to go on board the general and guide him to the land. But, being entered his ship, he found all mens countenances estranged as he passed through them; and when he came to his cabin, the earl, after a faint welcome, began to accuse him with "the breach of order and articles." Raleigh answer'd, Accused.
 "he knew not wherein he had been guilty of such breach." Essex replied, "there was an article "that none should land any of the troops without the general's presence, or his order." Raleigh desired leave to defend himself by those laws which himself as well as others had made, and his lordship, with the council of war, had authoriz'd; then he should find that no misdemeanor had been committed. "For, said he, there is an article indeed, that no captain of any ship,
 "or of any company, if he be separated from the fleet, shall land any-where without direc"tion from the general, or some other principal commander, upon pain of death. But I take His justifica-
 "my self, said Raleigh, to be a principal commander under your lordship, and therefore not sub"ject to that article, nor under the power of the marshal-law; because a successive commander "of the whole fleet, in her majesty's letters patents, your lordship and my lord Thomas Howard
 "failing. Besides, you agreed I should land at this island with your lordship, whom I have "attended these four days; and, finding that you came not, tho' you were half a dozen leagues
 "before me in your way thither, I weighed anchor, and could not but conclude, both that you "thought me strong enough to take this island, and were gone your self to take in some others.
 "Yet I refrained so long from landing, at Sir Guilly Merrick's entreaty, that I heard my "own company, even at my back, murmur; and say that I durst not attempt it. And, to "tell you the plain truth, my intent, at first, was only to water, till I saw them follow me in "that braving manner; which, with our reputations, we could not then shun and giver over,
 "being already in our boats for that purpose: for, if I had intended the taking of the town,
 "I would never have removed so far from our first road, which lay right before it." As for those officers and gentlemen who had been committed, Raleigh desired "they might receive no
 "hard measure in his cause; whatsoever his lordship conceived to be misdome, he must take it "wholly on himself to answer, being, at that time, commander in chief."

With these and other arguments Essex was so well pacified, that he went ashore into the town, and rested himself in Raleigh's lodging. There Raleigh invited him to supper, and offered, if he meant to call the matter further in question, to claim no privilege or favour; but would answer for himself more amply in the morning. Sir Christopher Blount, taking the earl's answer from him, said, "he thought my lord would not sup at all." To which Raleigh reply'd, "That, for his own appetite, he might, when he was invited, disable it at his own pleasure; but if the earl would stay, he should be glad of his company." In the mean time, the lord Thomas Howard, very nobly taking care that no disrespectful treatment should be offer'd to Raleigh, by the practice of his enemies, dealt with Essex to find how he stood resolved; and, the next morning, assured Raleigh, that his lordship sought only some acknowledgment; because the rest would think him a weak and tame commander, if he had not satisfaction. Raleigh, considering he had done nothing unjustifiable, and very certain that he was successively in the commission for the whole command of the fleet, therefore not subject to any corporal danger, as also of the lord Thomas Howard's sincere and honourable dealing, came again in the morning to visit Essex: otherwise, remembering the little trust that men ought to repose in such reconciliations, and the strong malice borne him by others in greatest favour with his lordship, had design'd to betake him to his own squadron; and so to have defended himself, or forsaken the earl. But the lord Thomas, after having given his honour with great kindness and resolution, that he would make himself a party if any wrong or violence were offered,* contrary to his lordship's pro-

* honour, men may be reasonably persuaded to adventure life and living, because great hope there is to die with reputation, or live to recover that peace which war hath continu'd: but, where men are no less oppress'd by insolency of commanders, than by insolency of foes, there is the calamity double; and, of two evils, the danger of war seems least; for that has end, the other "is infinite." Sir W. Raleigh's Acts of Empire, and Myseries of State disabinated, 8vo. 1692. p. 182.

* Sir Francis Vere says, that every one being to deliver his opinion of Raleigh's crime, it was grievously aggravated by the most: And adds: "for my part, no man shew'd less spleen against him than my self." Which last expression may imply a truth in relation to himself, by granting, that he shewed Raleigh some spleen; yet a falsehood, in regard to others; because, as here we see, the lord Thomas Howard was so far from bearing Raleigh any spleen, that he resolv'd to take his part against any injury that should be offer'd upon this occasion.

mise, persuading him to go and satisfy the earl, Raleigh took his counsel; and all things, after a little debate, came to a calm and quiet conclusion.<sup>a</sup>

THE promoters of this disturbance, however thus disappointed of their end, scrupled not to share in the benefits of this reprov'd victory, by lodging and refreshing themselves not only that night, but three or four days after, in the goodly town aforesaid; yet were they justly punish'd for their envy and ingratitude. For, had that time which they spent in carping and cavilling at Raleigh's conduct, throughout this brave action, been employ'd, according to his measures, in pursuing it; the birds, which thereby they suffer'd to fly out of their cage, had well rewarded their unanimity in taking them; and they would not have lost, as now they had, the ransom of so many Spanish prisoners out of the high fort; nor the spoil which they had convey'd out of the town for safety to that place: so that instead of assistance to advance the profit of this conquest, Essex's arrival brought only means, as far as in them lay, to destroy the honour of it.

The town
fir'd

Three Span- ish prizes taken.

AFTER the army had plentifully regaled themselves with the best provisions the island would afford, and the disgrac'd captains were receiv'd again into favour and command, they hoisted sail; having first, in honour of their lost men, made the town it self their funeral pile, and carried all the artillery, and other stores they found therein, or in the forts, to their ships. On the 26th of September, they cast anchor at Graciosa, where the chiefs of the island coming on board the general, submitted themselves with very acceptable humiliation, and willingly brought such provisions as were requir'd for their composition. This homage of those people banish'd all thoughts in the earl of further repairing, in that place, the great charges he principally had created by this voyage: for, whether it was through a generous valour, or the captivation of some inferior quality, I pretend not to decide; but he seem'd so charm'd with submission, as to have disregarded the advantages it might have yielded; and fonder of having a power over his enemies, than of making any effectual use of it. When they came to St. Michael's, they heard tidings of the Indian fleet; at which, most joyful acclamations rung through all their ships: within few hours after, they encounter'd and took three Spanish prizes, bound from the Havanna. The greatest of them, being about four hundred tons burden, was a very rich ship, as well for the lading, as the passengers in her; and this, if not the other two, was taken by Raleigh; who, being nearest, gave chase, caus'd her to strike and to yield. These three ships, especially the last, were laden with cocheneal, and other profitable merchandize, besides the silver, gold, pearl, civit, musk, ambergrease, found among the passengers, and acknowledg'd, by the merchants in them, to be richly worth above four hundred thousand ducats. When Raleigh had enquir'd, from the gallery of his own ship, of those who had computed the value of these commodities, and been satisfy'd it would at least amount to that sum, he privately said to our author; "Altho' we shall be little the better for these rich prizes, yet I am heartily glad, for our general's sake; because they will, in great measure, give content to her majesty; so that there may be no repining against this poor lord for the expence of the voyage." These ships made a discovery of forty sail of Spanish Indian men, whereof some were freighted with the king of Spain's treasure; and it was reported, that while three or four of the English fleet, which were fallen among them, were rising one that founder'd, the rest escap'd, and recover'd the Tercera. Essex, upon this mischance, call'd a council of war; and some of the colonels, with other land-officers, made liberal professions of the daring feats they would attempt, if boats, pinnaces and men were allow'd, how vain and impracticable soever they seem'd to the sea-commanders. For they offer'd, with fifteen hundred men, to take both that island and the forts; but these, knowing the difficulty of landing them, with their artillery, on so dangerous a place, in so bad a season; besides the strength of the fortifications, so well furnish'd by this new arrival, could not, cordially and seriously, give their consent, but urg'd many reasons to the contrary;<sup>b</sup> yet, when the lord Thomas Howard perceived this incomppliance would be used as a handle at home for their losing the Spanish fleet

<sup>a</sup> Sir Henry Wotton, having given us one example of Essex's severity in this voyage, where he threw a soldier, with his own hand, out of a ship; produces another of his frailty, as he calls it, in conniving at this bold trespass of Raleigh's: At which time he let fall (continues he) a noble word, being press'd by one (whose name he needs not remember) that he would put Raleigh, at least, upon a marshal-court That I would do, answer'd Essex, if he were not my friend; for so we have it in the first editions of Sir Henry's Parallel, both in 4to and 12mo; but in the succeeding editions 8vo, we read, as I remember, Essex's answer to be, That I would do, if he were my friend; which last, if the right reading, being still perhaps capable of more constructions than my author has made of it, according to the disposition of the readers towards the persons concern'd, I therefore leave to their paraphrase.

<sup>b</sup> Tho' our author Gorges, for brevity, omits these reasons; yet they may be partly gather'd from the observations Raleigh himself afterwards made on the strength of the Tercera, badness of the harbour, number of the fort, and especially the situation of that at Ayuga; in his Hist. of the World, lib. 5. cap. 1. sect. 9 and 10.

and treasure, he told Effex, that if he was so forward to have it attempted, both himself and Sir Walter Ralegh were ready to venture as far as any of them; and that they would undertake to spare three thousand able men out of the fleet for the service: but this second offer, thus absolutely and solemnly made, tho' of double the number, cool'd their courage, upon a little deliberation, who had made even the first; and so the vapour was dispell'd.

HENCE they return'd again to St. Michael's island, which they had left upon the intelligence aforefaid; and in this road Effex, with a great number of his officers, coming on board Ralegh's ship, hung out the flag of council; wherein they consider'd about landing, and taking of the fair town which lay so temptingly before their eyes, being unwall'd, and having but a slight fort for its defence by the sea-side. Effex was for landing all the companies immediately; but Ralegh desired that himself might first go and survey the place; because [the billows were here, in some parts, no less dangerous than where he had made the experiment at Fayal: the earl, at first, consented; but, as Ralegh was putting off, Effex standing in his gallery with Sir Christopher Blount, called him back in great haste, and said he would go himself. As he was descending into his barge, Ralegh, seeing him altogether unarm'd, except with his collar and sword, called aloud to him, and "desired him to take his cask and target of proof with him, if he designed to approach the shore; seeing so many muskets (above four hundred) lying there on the rest to oppose him." But Effex answer'd, "That he would have none, because he didn't dain'd to take any advantage of the watermen who rowed him;" for which our author censures him,<sup>a</sup> as he had before done Sir Walter Ralegh. However, in viewing of those landing-places, Effex and his officers kept cautiously enough beyond the reach even of culverin-shot; therefore, no such temerity in leaving the armour behind. Thus, after many offers and surveys, made aloof (says Gorges) the conveniencies of that place for landing were excepted against. "Albeit, adds he, in truth it was a fair and sandy beach (as all the fleet might well perceive) was some four or five miles from the town or fort, and much more easy than that of Fayal, where we before won our landing: and that this was true, many now living that were present, and saw both, can justly affirm." Yet our author proceeds to distinguish, that the earl was resolute enough of himself, and ready to undertake any good occasion of service; but "was then so led and accompanied with such politick land-captains, that, of all the services which fell under deliberation, those commonly, which were most unfeasible; were offer'd to be undertaken, and those most practicable rejected; whereby our affairs (says he) sped accordingly.

THIS descent being thus disliked, it was presently, in another consultation, resolv'd, that Ralegh should, with all the great ships, lie as near before the town of St. Michael as he could to keep them in continual alarm; while Effex, in a pinnace of Ralegh's, call'd the Guiana, with about two thousand men in boats, should, by night, convey themselves about six miles further than their first determin'd landing, to the town called Villa Franca. Accordingly, they all landed the next morning at this town, without any manner of resistance, while the fleet kept the other in such constant dread and confusion, that they could not regard their neighbours; to the end that the English army, having secured those, might the better fall on the back of these. But in vain did the fleet look over the hills and plains, in expectation of them; for that other pleasant town of Villa Franca, had so enchanted the army, being full of fruits, wines, and fresh victuals, that the commanders, as well as their soldiers, were content there to take up their quarters, without further thoughts of St. Michael's town; and, for six days together, lay feasting, and carrying on board the wheat, salt, woad, and other merchandize, into certain private mens ships that followed the fleet for such purposes. While Ralegh lay thus at anchor, there came into the road a ship of Brasil laden with the woods of that name, and of Pernambuc, with sugars as well as other merchandize; and anchor'd full in the midst of the English fleet. This ship, as Sir Francis Vere also informs us, was taken by Sir Walter Ralegh;<sup>b</sup> and her cargo, when brought into England, was very faithfully dispos'd of by our au-

<sup>a</sup> "In my opinion (says Gorges) tho' that answer much shewed his valour; yet became it not the place that my lord held: for, in truth, a general ought not to be so adventurous and careless of himself upon every slight occasion, nor to go unarm'd to places of imminent peril. Homer describes the valiant heroes and brave leaders of the Greeks, to be best arm'd; as Achilles, Ajax, &c. — Inasmuch that their very arms

"are famous to these days, the use whereof we make now scornful. But they are no beaten soldiers in the wars who hold these opinions; for it is truly said, that a great and wise general should die old; and I have read, that Epaminondas was fin'd by his countrymen the Thebans, for being too forward and serving in a battle unarm'd, tho' he won the victory."

west, came bearing in with all her sails, also among them; whom she mistook for the Spanish Armada; “For the king of Spain’s men of war, when he made fleets, were “compounded of shipping of divers nations (as this author continues) and therefore more “difficultly distinguish’d from ours,” which at that time consisted of English, and Holland “bottoms, besides a great galleon (before-nam’d) and other Spanish vessels they had taken.” At sight of this carrack, Raleigh gave orders throughout his fleet to take in all their flags; also that none should weigh anchor, fire a gun, or put off a boat without leave. But, as she was bearing in, one of the Holland squadron, contrary to direction and to all discretion, suddenly weighed anchor, hoisted top-sail, and, as she approach’d, made two or three shot at her; whereupon, perceiving her mistake, she nimbly changed her course; at which instant, the wind changing also, so that she could not escape outwards; “she, with the help thereof, and the “fear of falling into our hands, says Gorges, run herself a-ground close under the town and “fort.” Here, finding Raleigh follow her, and her danger inevitable, she discharg’d her men in the boats that flock’d about her, with some of her wares, and was then instantly set on fire in many places at once. Raleigh and his men still pursued to board her, and prevent her loss; tho’ not without great danger in his row-barge as he was, the surge being very outrageous; but by then he could get up to her, she was all over thunder and lightning; her ordnance discharging from every port, and her whole hulk, masts, cordage, and furniture, over-run with such a thorough, yet distinct and unconfus’d blaze, as represented the figure of a ship more perfectly in fire, than could be done by any painter with all his art and colours: and, when she was consumed even to the surface of the water, she exhal’d, as her last breath, such clouds from her spicy entrails, as, for a great way, and for many hours, perfum’d the air and coast around. Had the army then been at St. Michael’s town, as was expected, it might have secured this ship before she could have disembark’d her men, or, if it had terrify’d her back to sea, she must have been taken by the fleet; and then the treasures she contain’d, with those in this town, might probably have reimbursed the charges of their voyage; since our author, laying this loss upon the said land-forces, thought it so much to be lamented, that they were not to be excused.<sup>b</sup>

A rich carrack fir’d.

NEITHER Essex nor his army being heard of in all this time, Raleigh was in a consultation about drawing up the fleet towards him, when he perceiv’d the earl’s ship, by her flag, turning out from the point of Villa Franca. Then Raleigh, taking captain Morgan in his barge, rowed to him, and, the same night, sent the captain back with directions, in the general’s name, to command all the fleet to weigh and come to that town. It much grieved the mariners, to see the unprofitable measures which were thus taken, and that they must relinquish the advantages they might have made of the town before which they lay. When the fleet was got up to the army at Villa Franca, a general command was given that all the companies should repair to their respective ships, for the time of year was approached that the winds and waves began to rise too high for them to ride on those coasts any longer: so they left this town also entire, upon what considerations our author knew not, but thought the woad-mongers and corn-merchants might be most likely to resolve the question.

His dangers and distress in returning home.

ON the ninth of October they set sail for England, and, after three or four days, were violently toss’d about and dispers’d in a most tempestuous sea. Raleigh’s ship was near being stemm’d by the shock she received from another that was driven against her, whereby she became so leaky, that he had much ado to keep her above water. He was further in such great <sup>a</sup> Sir Walter Raleigh, in his discourse touching a war with Spain, and our protection of the Netherlands, has discover’d many other disadvantages in the Spanish fleets of these times, through this medley of shipping whereof they were compos’d; as the diversity of conduct and swiftness in them, whereby they could not either assail or defend in profit as the English or Dutch could. Also the confusion among their mariners, of so many different countries, and consequently languages; so as not to understand directions, and take them in general, or even mistake them, to the loss of their ship: besides, being of such strange nations, unconcern’d in the quarrels they were forced into, they fought with their hands, but not their hearts; and desir’d liberty rather than victory. See Raleigh’s Three discourses, Svo. 1702. p. 13, 14.

<sup>b</sup> “For (as Sir A. Gorges continues) no good reason could “be yielded, as was thought, nor durst be demanded, “why so gallant a company, so easily landed, for so good “a purpose, should so long linger in a little town, suffering themselves and the whole army upon fruits and distress for want of drink, that Sir Arthur Gorges proffer'd one of the victuallers six chests of sugar for six hogsheads of fresh water, but could not obtain it: insomuch that they were forced to set their great stills on work to furnish themselves in the best manner they could. During this storm, 'tis also observed, many sorts of birds flew into his ship; and the dove, that came among them, was look'd upon to presage the calm that ensued two days after. When they began to meet again, they descry'd, at a great distance, the earl of Essex, accompanied with only two little barks; who, about a week before, was attended with fourscore sail of good ships. "A true type, says Gorges, of this world's inconstant pomp, which the wind and seas did faithfully teach us not to build too much upon! And I wish our noble general, adds he, for his own sake and better fortune, had made that good observation thereof."

“wine, to the neglect of the service determin’d? But it “was manifest, that, besides their pleasure and good cheer, “the great store of woad, corn and salt, did entice some “land-men of good credit, who had ships there of their “own, rather to take the peaceable and private benefit “thereof, than to undergo some pain and peril for the “winning of St. Michael’s town for the publick good. “This was a piece of service very unfortunately neglect- “ed, but upon what good reason I could never learn; “and I am persuaded, that if his lordship had built less “upon some mens violent counsels and vain conceits, he “might have done many things better, and long have “lived in great prosperity: but all his care was to content “and win unto him certain politicians and martial men, “whom, notwithstanding, he found many times ungrate- “fully to deal with him, to serve their own turn; draw- “ing him, withal, into ambitious humours and affecta- “tions of popularity; which, with our great men, rarely “succeed well.

AFTER hailing and saluting one another, they consulted with their masters and pilots about the best course homewards, wherein they of Raleigh's ship varied much from those who guided the earl's: and tho' Essex had the directions of John Davis, a navigator of much experience and repute, who could have carried them, without error, to many distant parts of the world; yet, in conducting the ships home to their own coast, did he strangely fail in his pilotage and conjecture for the sleeve. However, all follow'd the admiral, and when he thought he was not far from the entrance of the Channel, all hands fell to sounding for ground; and, at last, found it; tho' indeed "I saw few the wiser thereby, says our author, or the more assured of the coast," except the skilful master of Raleigh's ship, old Broadbent, who knew it to be the banks of Scilly." But there was no convincing of Essex; so all followed his erroneous light; yet Raleigh kept at some distance behind all night-long. At break of day, tho' it was close and foggy, he perceived how providentially he had escaped destruction in the dark and dangerous passage he had made close by those fatal rocks call'd the Bishop and his Clerks. Soon after he also discerned Essex, and many with him, about three leagues before, bearing in with all their sail north-east, instead of east and by north, full upon the sands of the Welsh coast; on which, in that gloomy weather, he had certainly struck and perish'd, had he held on a little longer; and had not Sir A. Gorges, who was then upon the latter watch (Raleigh being retired to rest) forced the master-gunner of his ship to discharge a warning-piece three or four times, much against his will, and that of the master himself, who, contrary to all duty and humanity, "said they deserv'd to taste the peril of their own wilfulness, having brought themselves and all the fleet clearly our of their way into such danger."

UPON this admonition Essex, with all his train, soon tack'd about, and, afterwards, confess'd their error. With much ado, they beat up to double the cape of Scilly, and enter'd the Sleeve. Raleigh, by this time, was shot along the north-side of Cornwall; for his ship was so crazy, and his provisions so scanty, he durst not put again to sea, but stood along the coast; and that night anchor'd before St. Ives, where he found the Cornish people all in alarm, several Spanish caravals and fly-boats, which lay there, having made some descents by stealth, and put them into great fright and confusion. For Essex, because he met not with the Adelantado, had both believed and reported into England, that he never stirr'd out to sea this year; whereas, indeed, while the strength of the English navy lay before the Islands, he had set out with a puissant fleet for the invasion of England; and these lesser vessels, which were sent before, did here attend his coming. But that storm aforesaid, which so roughly scatter'd the English, was more favourable to their country, than, when they felt it, they imagin'd; by dispersing, and driving back at the same time, this Spanish Armada utterly disabled for the intended enterprise. Raleigh arriving at this juncture, gave great joy to this part of the kingdom; and, being landed, he immediately took such order for the safeguard of the county, whereof he was her majesty's lieutenant, as soon dispell'd the fears of its inhabitants. Then, having supply'd his ship with proper necessaries, he sent her round to the fleet, and she was paid off at Bristol, with the profits that arose from one of the prizes he had taken before-named. Had as good an account been given of the other prizes, this expedition, for all the casualties and oversights

* This sounding of ours, so much in practice, continues Sir Arthur Gorges, and yet, many times, bringing no great certainty, makes me call to mind an odd conceit and speech of a Spanish prisoner, which the general gave me in this journey. He was a gentleman, a soldier, and, of late years, traded to the West Indies: with whom I one day talking and discoursing of their voyages (wherein he was very well experienc'd) he told me that, in their navigation from the Indies, they sought out Spain in a more certain and gallant manner than we did England. For, said he, We seek out our coast aloft with our eyes by the heavens, by the sun or stars, and with the use of art and instruments, which seldom or never fails. But you, said he, that seek for which happen'd in it, would have return'd her majesty double the charge she had been at in setting it forth. " But it was strange to see what careless courses were held in those actions set out by the state, says our author; and what poor returns they made into the Exchequer. " Thus, for the merchandize in the prizes now brought home, a composition was made with the queen, which was not a third part of the real worth; because the full freight and value thereof never came to publick light, not being faithfully certify'd under the hands of sufficient officers when first taken; nor any part sold, but to the buyer's advantage." He concludes, " That they, who had so play'd the wise stewards, in thus providing for themselves and their followers, reaped all the grace, as well as gain, from those who had more carefully and justly intended the publick service: and that this general neglect of truth and merit throughout the world, is the cause why so few apply themselves to those sincere and unprofitable courses; especially, seeing how many do daily, by fraud and flattery, find shorter and smoother ways to honour, wealth and preferment, even beyond all measure and expectation."<sup>a</sup>

England, when you are forced to run into narrow seas, are forced, for your surest directions, like men blindfold, to search under the water, and scrape with lead and tallow to the bottom for banks, sands, and shelves, as if you wou'd rake hell for instructions, to find out the channel, which you call the sleeve; and yet, for all your soundings, are oftentimes mistaken. I answer'd him; Indeed it was true, that our humility taught us to go by the ground; whereas their pride led them to gaze above the clouds, and thereby so dazzled their eyes, that they often stumbled upon those men of war which now used as well to sound the Spanish pocket, as the English sleeve.

RALEGH took his journey to Plymouth, where a commission came down from the state to lord Thomas Howard, lord Mountjoy, himself, and Sir F. Vere, with monies for repairing, victualling, and sending about the fleet to Chatham; and for maintaining the thousand Low-Country soldiers which were now quarter'd along the coast of Cornwall, and afterwards sent into Ireland. Essex, in the mean while, posted away to London; but, whatever advantage he might have in first shaping out the story of their adventures to the queen, it little avail'd him; for Sir Francis Vere soon after arriving also at court, understood his lordship was retir'd to his house at Wansted in great discontentment: for the queen was so incens'd against the earl, that she laid the whole blame of their evil success on his lordship, both for not burning and spoiling the Spanish fleet at Ferroll, and missing that which came from India. Vere says, he justify'd his lordship, and laid the blame upon those who deserv'd it, with such earnestness, that the standers-by (her majesty then walking in the garden at Whitehall) might hear him: insomuch, that he quieted the queen, as he tells us; who then discoursed with him of the earl's humours and ambition, and, at last, construed all so graciously, that she fell into commendation of him; so that he soon after came to court.<sup>b</sup> But he staid not long there, nor with any ease or content; so insupportable was it to find Cecil made master of the wards, the lord-admiral Howard

<sup>a</sup> Thus ends Sir Arthur Gorges's accurate relation of the Island-Voyage; concerning whom, as some small return of commemoration, it may not be ungrateful here to join a few dispersed particulars, as follows. He was the son of Sir William Gorges, who, about the year 1580, was vice-admiral in a fleet set out by the queen to guard the Irish coast from the Spanish forces then coming to aid the Desmonds: In his return, he took that famous English pirate Derwall; who, tho' he saved the admiral, Sir John Perrot's life, his ship, with all her crew, when in a storm she was cast upon a sand; by directing all her sails to be hoisted, contrary to all other judgments; and had the admiral's promise, on his faith and honour, to get his pardon, who did intercede for it; yet were his deserts over-look'd, and his offences punished with death. As to that vice-admiral's son Arthur, he was both a valiant and a learned gentleman; was one of the volunteers against the Spanish Invasion, as we have before observed, and afterwards in several other engagements. He married Douglas Howard, daughter and heir of Henry lord Howard, viscount Byndon; which lady dying young in 1591, the famous Spenser wrote a fine pastoral elegy upon her, which is printed among his works, by the name of Daphnaida; and the poet, in his dedication thereof to the lady Helena, marchioness of Northampton, tells her, " The occasion why I wrote the same was, as well the great good fame I heard of her deceas'd, as the particular good-will I bear unto her husband, maller Arthur Gorges, a lover of learning and virtue; whose house as your ladyship, by marriage, hath honoured; so do I find the name of them, by many notable records, to be of great antiquity, and such as have ever borne themselves with honourable reputation to the world, and unspotted loyalty to their prince and country. Besides, so lineally descended from the Howards, that the lady Anne Howard, eldest daughter of John duke of Norfolk, was wife to Sir Edmund, mother to Sir Edward, and grandmother to Sir William and Sir Thomas Gorges, knights." Now, as to the relation of this voyage to the Isles of Azores, in which Sir A. Gorges was captain of Sir Walter Raleigh's ship, tho' we are not expressly enough told by Purchas, it was printed before he gave it us in his collections; yet he says it was written by Sir Arthur in 1607, and dedicated to that great hope of Great-Britain, prince Henry. He has omitted the epistle to him, and the preface; but not defalked any of the author's narrative, which fills near eight sheets of paper in his fourth volume of voyages. It is adorn'd with many good military and marine reflections; tho', with some other passages, of too general import to be interwoven in any particular account of Sir Walter Raleigh. Purchas further informs us, that Gorges also added to this treatise, Notes touching the navy royal, " which are worth the noting," says he; but perhaps not to be permitted to every vulgar and noteless eye: because, as he goes on, veritas odium parit; Pains may cause pains, and busy-labour reap the reward of a busy-body." From hence it should seem that Purchas followed a copy less common than any thing which had then passed the press. But, tho' Sir W. Raleigh might have read it in MS. I cannot think it is this he points at; where, introducing his own account of the conquest of Fayal, which we have given in a note before; he says, " Whereas I find an action of mine cited with omission of my name, I may, by a civil interpretation, think that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion that the enterprize was such, or so ill manag'd, as that no honour could be due unto it." Because, as Mr. Lediard has very justly observed, " Sir A. Gorges, in the circumstantial account he has given us of this action, displays the conduct and courage of Sir W. Raleigh in several particulars, very much to his honour and advantage." Naval Exped. fol. 356. Then, as to his name, Gorges mentions it more than once, and at the beginning, with his title of command to it: so that tho' he may use this only all the way after, it is, in effect, as much as if he used his name; for it is then obvious enough who is meant by the rear-admiral. Nor need we suppose Gorges was herein tender or cautious of making Raleigh's name appear too glaring, when his person was under a cloud; for Essex and the lord Thomas Howard are spoken of in the like manner, and scarcely mention'd but by their titles of general and vice-admiral. Besides Raleigh's own word, that the action was only and must refer to some other shorter account than this original and copious history of it. All I shall observe more of Sir A. Gorges is, that he translated into English Sir Francis Bacon's learned and ingenious book, De Sapientia Veterum Vere's Commentaries, fol. 65, 66, 67.

created earl of Nottingham, for his services against the Spanish Invasion, and at Cadiz; and now Raleigh's actions at the Islands, esteem'd also more considerable than his own; tho' indeed by the fewer number; for the populace were easily led to believe the late disappointment of Essex's great expectations, was owing to Raleigh's regard of his own glory more than that of his country; whereby Raleigh lost their opinion, even tho' victorious against their enemies, while Essex was sure to return with triumph, however he miscarried in his attempts; and was always received by them with such joy, as if his great fleets and armies came laden with sufficient spoil and conquest, if they only brought him safe home again. Still both enjoy'd a liberal share in the queen's favour, but it only ratify'd the veneration of the multitude to one, and their disaffection to the other;<sup>a</sup> yet was their esteem more fatal to Essex, at least more speedily so, than their prejudice to Raleigh. However, the queen was little influenc'd with their partiality to either; till Essex too zealously cultivated that which so unreasonably increas'd in his favour; for she loved her people without jealousy, nor was offended at his being the darling of their eyes, till she found him inclin'd to be the darling of their hearts.<sup>b</sup> And, as for the blame which Camden says they now laid on each other of the late misadventures, and which, he informs us, grew to a more open rupture, it seems to have fallen most upon Essex, and that Raleigh's conduct was approv'd; because Essex was never after trusted with the command of any naval expedition, but Raleigh was. Yet whatever misconduct in others Raleigh might be now driven to object, in his own defence; his generosity to Essex, and some of his followers, whom he might have laid it upon, many years after their death, when there was little fear of being controverted, is so much above most of theirs to him while they were alive, that, having then occasion to mention this voyage, he does not drop the least inuendo against any of them; but ascribes their disappointments in it to the most unblamable cause.<sup>c</sup>

by the populace.

BEFORE Raleigh could well arrive, I think, at London, to give an account of this expedition, the parliament was met at Westminster; for we read, that the queen went thither in an open chariot, all cover'd over-head canopy-wise with silver tissue, and begun the session on the twenty-fourth of October this year. Raleigh, making but a short stay in town, went to his seat at Sherbourn; of which he must have had but little enjoyment for two or three years past. Towards the latter end of November following, we find Mr. Adrian Gilbert, now a burges for Bridport in Dorsetshire, obtain'd licence of the speaker that he might retire to his brother Sir Walter Raleigh, in that county, for the benefit of his health. About a month afterwards, that is, on the twentieth of December, we meet with Raleigh in the house; for what place return'd, I find not; and that day the parliament was adjourn'd till the eleventh of January. When they met again, Raleigh appears frequently in committees, upon several bills of the greatest consequence that were then read; as that against lewd and wandering persons pretending to be soldiers or mariners; another for an act to increase people for the service and strength of the realm; one to explain an act for the maintenance of the navy; one for paying the queen's debts; one for erecting houses of correction and punishment of rogues, vagabonds, and sturdy beggars; besides many others, whose titles are more proper to be sought in the parliamentary-journals of this reign, than here barely to be recited: for the clerk of this house, whose inaccuracy we have before observ'd, seeming to have melted down most of the speeches in this session, for brevity, into a narrative of its proceedings, little or nothing of Sir Walter Raleigh's arguments is to be particularly extracted. Nor only in the speeches, but other circumstances, has that clerk been deficient, particularly one, in which Raleigh was concern'd, relating to some nice distinction of form or ceremony wherewith the lords are wont to receive the commons on certain occasions; which therefore we must take, as from the journals of the upper house it has been represented; and there it appears, that some condescension in the lord-keeper Egerton had rais'd an objection in the commons on its being now omitted. For, on the fourteenth day of January, Sir Walter Raleigh, with divers other knights and burgeses, being sent to desire a conference with the lords, upon some amendments of the bill for erecting houses of correction before-mention'd; and signification being given, that they might come in to receive their answer, it was thought proper that the lord-keeper should now deliver it sitting in his place (the lords also sitting) and not by going down to the bar, as the form is when the lords receive bills or messages from them ; and as the lord-keeper had sometimes before done, it seems, in delivering answers. This reception being represented to the house of commons, they sent some other members to desire satisfaction, as for an innovation derogatory to their liberty. Here Sir Walter Raleigh's part in this difference ending, we shall refer our readers to an abstract of its consequence at the foot of the page,<sup>a</sup> that too much interruption may not appear in the thread of his story ; and only observe, as to the remainder of this session, that it was clos'd with a grant to the queen of three subsidies, and six fifteenths and tenths.<sup>b</sup>

THE parliament being dissolv'd on the ninth of February, Raleigh seems not to have resided long in town ; for, soon after, some regulations being made for the publick good of those people over whom he presided, by his offices of power, in the West of England, we find him celebrated, for his exercise thereof among them, as a very worthy patriot in several instances. The lord Burghley is mention'd in one of them, who died about six months after the said parliament broke up, that is to say, in August 1598 ; therefore we must here relate it, as occurring before this time. It concern'd the restoration of certain manors to their ancient tenure in Cornwall ; for there are seventeen appertaining to that dutchy, which took or renew'd their Holdings, as they call it, every seven years of certain commissioners, for near three centuries past ; whereby the tenants reckon'd a kind of inheritable estate, accruing to them. But, notwithstanding this long prescription, a bold and busy person in these times, getting an Exchequer-lease of one or two such tenements, called the whole right in question ; but, failing of success, another, soon after, resumed the broken title, and prosecuted it even to a Nisi prius. Hereupon, the tenants deputed certain gentlemen, among whom was the author of this passage, Richard Carew of Anthony Esq; one of the deputy-lieutenants of the county, to repair to London with a petition to the said lord-treasurer Burghley ; who, calling to him the chancellor and barons of the Exchequer, found (besides this long continuance, and the importance thereof, as touching the ruin of above a thousand inhabitants) that her majesty possessed no lands which yielded her so fair a benefit as these, in rents, fines, heriots, and other perquisites. These reasons found favourable allowance, but did not procure an effectual remedy, till the said gentlemen became supplicants to her majesty in person ; who then, having been prepared, it seems, by Raleigh's applications and interest, testify'd her dislike of the attempter ; and expressly order'd the cessation of his attempt. For, says this author, herein we were beholden to Sir Walter Raleigh's earnest writing, who was then in the country ; also to the advice of Sir Henry, and the solicitations of Mr. W. Killegrew.<sup>c</sup> Another example of his zealous affection for the ease and advantage of these people under his jurisdiction, appears in his lightning them of a certain burdensome tax, which carried many other inconveniences with it. For, as the products and commodities in those western parts had been anciently very much oppress'd with tributes to the earls of Cornwall, whereby the condition of a Cornish inhabitant and a French peasant differ'd very little ; so latterly, while Raleigh was lieutenant of that county, there wanted not some, who, through favour at court, and plausible representations to her majesty, did, in part, revive the same ; and, under pretext of restoring a rent decay'd ever since the ninth of king Henry II, to the pretended detriment of the crown, procured letters patent, that none should salt, dry, or pack any fish in Devonshire or Cornwall, without their licence or warrant ; the ill consequences

<sup>a</sup> Upon this message, the lords consulted touching the usage of their house, as it had been observed by those of longest continuance therein ; and it was resolv'd, that their custom was and is, " When any bills or messages be brought from the house of commons to the upper house, the lord keeper and the rest of the lords are to rise and go down to the bar to meet those who come from the commons, and there receive their said messages or bills : but, contrariwise, when any answer is to be deliver'd by the lord-keeper, in the name and behalf of the house, to such as come from the commons, these members are to receive the same standing towards the lower end of the said upper house, without the bar ; and the lord-keeper is to deliver it sitting in his place, with his head cover'd, the other lords also keeping their places ; and that whenever it had been otherwise done, it was by error or mistake, and therefore not to be drawn into precedent." Then the attorney-general and Serjeant Draue being sent to the lower house, signify'd, that if they would send for an answer to their demands, it should be given. The commons accordingly sent the same persons who had before demanded satisfaction. But, being come to the house, and having placed themselves at the lower end of the outward room, as at other times, except the lord-keeper and other lords came and met them at the bar to deliver their answer, the said keeper moved them to approach and receive it : then they, not perceiving the lords advance to the bar, protested, by Sir W. Knolls, that they had not commission to receive any answer in that form ; so departed. Hereupon, a motion was sent from the lords to the commons for a conference in the outward great chamber, to reconcile this matter ; where the aforesaid members, meeting the archbishop of Canterbury, lord-treasurer Burghley, and others of the most ancient peers, were assured by them, that the true and right form of receiving bills or messages, and delivering answers by the lord-keeper, was as is above related ; and that some late inadvertency in the regard thereof, was the occasion of their present misconstruction. Hereupon, the house of commons was satisfied ; and the same form was afterwards kept accordingly. Sir Simon Dave's journal of queen Elizabeth's parliaments, fol. 1708. p. 539, 540.

<sup>b</sup> Of these taxes, Camden gives us this explanation. A fifteenth and a tenth, is a certain tax on every city, borough and town, not upon every man in particular ; but a general sum, in proportion to the fifteenth part of the wealth of the respective places : a subsidy, we call that which is impos'd on every single person, as they are assess'd by poll, according to the value of their goods and lands. Eliz. anno 1563.

whereof grew so apparent, as being what would have made that patentee an absolute disposer of all the western shipping and traffick, with their sea and land-dependants; that the Cornish justices, whereof Mr. Carew afore said was one, made suit to the privy-council for redress; and, through the never-failing forwardness and backing of Sir Walter Raleigh, says the same author, obtain'd a revocation thereof.<sup>a</sup> Here, not to divide from this head, what properly falls under it, we may also add Raleigh's good offices, the two following years, for freeing the inhabitants of these parts from those heavy impositions, with which the trade and manufacture also of their tin-works were very much embarrass'd. These impositions were occasion'd by the merchants and usurers who advanced money to the tinnery, upon whom their encroachments were now grown so exorbitant, that Raleigh was importun'd to revive the privilege of pre-emption, founded on that clause in the charter of king Edward I. allowing them to vend their tin to their best behoof, nisi nos ipsi emere voluerimus. It had been attempted by others before him, who alledg'd many reasons how it might prove advantageous, not only to her majesty, but the country, and prejudicial to none but those extortioners, who practis'd a far worse kind of pre-emption.<sup>b</sup> But tho' this means of redress was by those persons hotly begun, and a reasonable price offer'd, it soon cool'd again, till it receiv'd a new life in Michaelmas term 1599; for then the Cornish men, being in London, were call'd before the principal lords of her majesty's council, and the matter was there debated by Sir Walter Raleigh in behalf of the country, against those advocates deputed for the merchants who had promoted this suit; and he brought it to such a conclusion that articles were sign'd. Indeed it did not immediately take effect: yet, it seems, the privilege was afterwards invested in Raleigh, and that he put his power in execution. In November, the following year, he held a court at Lostwithiel, the usual place for Stannary causes; where having signified her majesty's pleasure for a new tax of six pounds on every thousand weight of tin that should be transported, besides two pounds and sixteen shillings already payable, he told them also, that her majesty had been prevail'd on so far to disengage them from dealing with the merchants and usurers, that she would disburse four thousand pounds in loan to the tinnery for a year's space, and was contented to be repaid in tin:<sup>c</sup> and lastly what appears totally to have excluded those merchants from the exercise of their impositions is, that, by the time of the ensuing parliament, Raleigh appears to have had the power of pre-emption granted him; because, in a speech of his, which we shall take notice of, having justly maintain'd his title thereto, from the charter before-mention'd, he yet no less generously offers to resign it, as indeed he not long after voluntarily did,<sup>d</sup> if those, who had privileges of far less ancient establishment, would follow his example. But, as these and his other eminent services to those people, are best to be judg'd of by such as beheld and tasted the benefits that flow'd from them: so we shall here only add the publick acknowledgment thereof which Mr. Carew made, a few months after that parliament rose, in the following dedication to Sir Walter Raleigh, of his excellent Survey of Cornwall. "This my ill-husbanded survey, long since begun, a great while discontinu'd, lately review'd, and now hastily finish'd; appeals to your lordship's direction, whether it should pass; to your correction, if it do pass; and to your protection, when it is pass'd. Neither unduely: for the same intreats of the province and persons over whose bodies and estates you carry a large, both martial and civil, command by your authority; but in whose hearts and loves you possess a far greater interest by your kindness. Your ears and mouth have ever been open to hear and deliver our grievances; and your feet and hands ready to go and work their redress; and that, not only always as a magistrate of yourself, Procures the revocation of a tax on the curing of fish.

Revives the pre-emption of tin.

<sup>b</sup> "When any western gentleman (says Mr. Carew) wants money to defray his expences at London, he resorts to one of the tin merchants to borrow some; but shall as soon wrest the club out of Hercules's fist, as one penny out of their fingers, unless they give bond for every twenty pounds so taken in loan, to deliver 1000 pound weight of tin at the next coinage, which shall be within two or three months, or half a year at farthest. At which time the price of every thousand will not fail to be at least 23, perhaps 25 pounds; yea, and after promise made, must be driven with some indignity to make three or four errands to his house, before he shall get the money deliver'd. Thus some one merchant will have 500 pounds out before-hand, reaping thereby a double commodity, both of excessive gain for his loan, and of assurance of being serv'd with tin for his money. This they say is no usury forsooth, because the price of tin is not commonly known beforehand (for once only, within these twelve years, on purpose to escape the penalty of the law, they brought it a little under 20 pounds the thousand) but, if to take above fifty in the hundred be extremity, whatsoever name you list to give it, this, in truth, can be no other than cut-throat and abominable dealing." Survey of Cornwall, p. 14, b. 16.

<sup>d</sup> Then it was recommended to king James; however, he had just before made a proclamation against all monopolies; for in 1604. there were several schemes and estimates drawn up on this project of pre-emption; one whereof sets forth the profits of it, and disadvantages of putting it down. In another we find this particular; "There are two coinages of tin every year, and about eleven or twelve hundred-run coin'd at each time; and if the king farms the pre-emption for 10000 l. then there will remain to the farmers 9500 l." Cotton library Titus B. V. towards the end of the volume.

“ but also very often, as a fuitor and follicitor to others of the highest place. Wherefore I,
 “ as one of the common beholden, present this token of my private gratitude. It is duty, “ and not presumption, that hath drawn me to the offering; and it must be favour, and “ not desert, that shall move your lordship to acceptance: and so I take humble leave, rest“ ing no less willing to serve you, than under you.”

THIS author (Mr. Carew) subscribes himself, to that dedication, Sir Walter Ralegh's kinsman; but was no less innobled and honour'd for his accomplishments than his family, as Camden has observ'd; who further acknowledges the great assistance he receiv'd in his description of Cornwall from this author's curious Survey of its antiquities and natural history.<sup>a</sup> For his abilities in these studies he was admitted (as upon a very modest occasion he mentions himself) an associate of the Antiquary College.<sup>b</sup> A fragment of the speech he made at his introduction to the said society, among other materials relating to him, I communicated, about a dozen years since, to the learned and ingenious writer of his life before the new impression of his works.<sup>c</sup> And now that he was in London, soliciting one of the aforesaid causes (for the Cornish tinnors) I find his name mention'd in a list of near twenty other antiquaries, who were summon'd to a meeting at the house of a Garter King of Arms (which, I suppose, was Sir William Dethicke, at the Heralds Office) in order, probably, to receive some questions, or bring his opinion in writing to others which had been propounded, as the manner then was.<sup>d</sup> Now, perceiving Sir Walter Ralegh to have patroniz'd the antiquities of Cornwall, written by one member of that society, and that Mr. John Hooker, another gentleman learned in the antiquities of this realm, and perhaps a member also of the same body (for their names are not all yet known) address'd his Historical Record of Devonshire to a person of honourable place in the commonwealth, who is conceived by one that had seen it, to have been also Sir Walter Ralegh;<sup>e</sup> to which honourable person the said work being deliver'd at its author's death, he committed it to Mr. Dodderidge, another member of the said society (who had leisure to fit it for, and did recommend it to the press, tho' it never was printed:<sup>f</sup>) finding also that Sir Walter Ralegh was acquainted with, and honourably spoken of by others of this assembly, as Sir Henry Spelman, also Sir Robert Cotton, from whose library we find Ralegh afterwards borrowing some manuscripts, and that Mr. John Selden was oblig'd to Ralegh's library for others; I could not but think him somehow related to the said society, and at last have found, that he likewise was a member thereof. This intelligence I receive from another list of these associates, in a manuscript address'd soon after Ralegh's death to king James; which also further contains this observation upon that society. “ There was a time, most excellent king, when “ as well under queen Elizabeth, as under your majesty, certain choice gentlemen, men of “ known proof, were knit together, statis temporibus, by the love of these studies, upon “ contribution among themselves: which company consisted of an elective President and of “ Clarissimi; of other Antiquaries and a Register. But this their meeting, whose profession “ reached only to the matter of our antiquities, deserved to have an incorporative connection, “ by way of authority royal; for want whereof, they being depriv'd of the benefit of suf“ fection and substitution, a few of their friends and persons dying, the thing itself is abso“ lutely vanish'd: succession performing that in civil bodies, which generation does in na“ tural.<sup>g</sup>

<sup>d</sup> This summons dated anno domini Eliz. XLI. is published from a MS. in the Asmolean Museum at Oxford, by Mr. Thomas Hearne: See his Preface to a Collection of Curious Discourses by eminent Antiquaries, 8vo. Oxon. 1720. p. 41. These discourses were written between the year 1590 and 1605; therefore do, I think, somewhat disprove Sir Henry Spelman's computation (at least that summons does) that this society of Antiquaries was discontinued for twenty years and then reviv'd in 1614. King James was about this year, or soon after, so hot upon his college of controversial divinity at Chelsea, that I wonder not at his discouragement of the said society, thro' I know not what suspicion or pretence of their troubling matters of state or religion, whereby their meeting was wholly broke of; tho', as Spelman affirms, they had resolved to forbear all arguments on those subjects. See Sir Henry Spelman's Pref. to his last terms, as printed from a MS. in the Bodleian library, by Dr. Gibson the present bishop of London, in his life of Mr. Camden.

<sup>g</sup> Their names, however, deserving to live with honour, the said author sets them down, as they arose to his mind, promiscuously, in the following manner—Thomas earl of Dorset, Henry earl of Northampton, Fitzalan the last earl of Arundel, William lord Burghley, the Herberts earls of Pembroke, the learned lord Lumley, Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Henry Billingsley, Sir Gilbert and Sir William Dethicke, Sir Henry Fanshawe, Dr. Bartholomew Clark, and dean Cousins; Sir Daniel Donne, Sir Walter Cope and Ralegh; Mr. Benedict Barnham, Dr. Cowel, Francis Thynne Esq; Lancaster; Mr. Glover, Somerset; Hencage, keeper of the records; Bensfield, Erdswick, Lambert, Valence, &c. Esqs. Mr. Talbot, and Mr. John Stow, &c. Then telling the king how justly the dissolution of so well an intended exercise was lamented by all those worthy patriots, who knew his majesty's realms afforded living persons of prime worth, fit to keep up and celebrate that Round Table, he cites some of their names; as, lord William Howard, lord Carew, Sir Fulk Greville, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir P.

BUT, to return a little into the more open and publick current of action, we must here observe, that king Henry the fourth of France having, about the end of the last parliament, informed the queen of England, by an ambassador, that he had held some conferences with the Spanish ministers about a peace, but would come to no conclusion without her consent, and that of the united states; her majesty sent some commissioners over: and, while they were negotiating this business in France, she had the argument very closely debated in her council at home. Here Effex was one of those, who would by no means listen to any manner of accommodation; and, while the matter was upon the carpet, was so expeditious as to produce a formal apology, in writing, for his reasons; it being dated in 1598, and written before the king of Spain's death in the beginning of September the same year. Yet, upon this topic, there ensued a warm dispute, says Camden, betwixt the queen and Effex; as also upon her chusing some able minister to superintend the affairs of Ireland. She look'd upon the earl's uncle, Sir William Knolles, as a proper person for that charge. Effex prefer'd Sir George Carew, perhaps on purpose, says Camden, to get rid of him: and, when the queen would not be persuaded to approve his choice, he, quite forgetting all duty, turn'd his back upon her in a contemptuous manner. The queen, unable to bear his insolence, dismiss'd him her presence with a box on the ear. The fury this threw the earl into, is better conceiv'd than express'd; but having, with his hand on his sword, told the queen, "He would not have taken such a blow from her father," he retired from court. The lord-keeper Egerton sent him a prudent and pacifying letter; in which, among other wholesome motives to submission and complacency, he says, "In this course you hold, if you have any enemies, you do that for them which they could never do for themselves; while your friends you leave to scorn and contempt." The earl return'd a long and passionate answer, as Camden calls it; in which it appears, he had also suffer'd some imprisonment; and wherein he makes this reply to those objections: "In this course do I any thing for my enemies? When I was present, I found them absolute; and therefore I had rather they should triumph alone, than have me attendant upon their chariots. Or do I leave my friends? When I was a courtier, I could sell them no fruit of my love; and now I am a hermit, they shall bear no envy for their love to me." But the lord-keeper soon brought him out of his hermitage; and he was, in a little time, re-admitted into the queen's favour. However, his friends, according to Camden, were apt to date his ruin from this unlucky circumstance: and indeed, it hence appears, he had no enemies so great, or who so much conspired to his fall, as his own passions, his unreasonable expectations of an absolute conformity to his own will, and impatience to behold any body aspire to distinction, who did it not thro' his patronage and protection. Of this he gave a most notorious example about this time; in which he made Raleigh a publick object of his opposition, tho' it ended in his own disgrace, and his relapse into the queen's displeasure; which he might have prevented, had he

Manwood, Sir John Davis, Sir Henry Savile, Mr. Camden, Sir Henry Spelman, Dr. John Hayward, Tate, Whitlock, Selden and Bolton. Thus in a MS. entitled, an Address for a Corporation Royal, to be founded under the title of king James his ACADEM, or College of Honour. Fol. eleven sheets, p. 6, 7, 8, 9. My reasons that it was written in 1619, and conjectures by whom, I have given in the book itself; which is in the possession of Mr. George Vertue, whose readiness to impart from his own curious collections, and procure from those of his learned and worthy friends, whatever might be useful to my present undertaking, deserves more frequent acknowledgments, as having in several other places conduced to the illustration thereof. This list of our primitive antiquaries, and that in the learned Dr. Smith's life of Sir Robert Cotton, together with those in Mr. Hearn's Preface, p. 41. aforesaid, and p. 112, may perhaps somewhat alleviate this last author's "despair of getting a perfect catalogue of those eminent and excellent men, tho' several of their names were industriously conceal'd since the dissolution of the society." And this remark will lead us to observe, how obscurely even Sir Walter Raleigh is huddled over in the list here above exhibited. It was surely intended as a courtly compliment, thus to lop off all distinction or title of honour, by saddling him behind another Sir Walter, and shewing his very name headless, to that person who had newly made his body so. Another observation which occurs to me from this list is, that it seems to carry the antiquity of this society higher than is commonly apprehended: for if Robert Glover, who was made Somerſet herald in 1571 (as I find in a MS. written by the late Peter Le Neve, Esq; Norroy, upon the succession of the heralds from queen Mary's reign) died in 1583, as I think the same MS. demonstrates, or at least as Dr. Fuller informs us; the said society must have been existent in this year, how much more early soever it was before. As to its interrupted progress down to our time, it would demand, as it does deserve, an ample history to display it. This general view we may here spare room for: That in the former part of king Charles's reign it bloom'd out afresh; but droop'd in the civil wars. It seems to have shone forth again after Oliver Cromwell's death; for then Mr. Ashmole, in the Diary of his own Life, mentions the ANTIQUARIES Feast; but, during the factions in the close of king Charles II's reign, to have been under a cloud. It was revived in the reign of his late majesty, anno 1717, and has continued to this day. Having gather'd in this space to a body of fifty or sixty members, nobility as well as gentry, and clergy as well as laity; some of whom are well known in the Republick of Letters for their own labours, and many highly deserving from it, for contributing to the improvement of other mens; among which, gratitude cannot omit the Life of Sir W. RALEGH.

* These quotations I have made from the ancient and fair copies in a volume of State Letters, written between the years 1533 and 1629, among the valuable collections of the right honourable the lord Coleraine, fol. 345, 351; where Effex's letter to the lord-keeper concludes with these words: "Let Solomon's foot laugh when he is stricken; let those who mean to make their profit of princes shew to have no sense of princes injuries; let them acknowledge an infinite abluteness on Earth who do not believe an absolute infiniteness in Heaven, &c." But hereby discover'd himself an ill imitator of his old tutor in court-conduct, Leicester, who had attained to the art not only of pocketing all affronts, but of converting them into favours, and even converting them into benefits.

kept his word to the lord-keeper, and suffer'd Raleigh to have triumph'd alone: for, during this reconciliation, or last blaze Effex made with any credit at court, this memorable contest seems to have been promoted by him, at the martial exercises perform'd on the queen's birth-day, which was the 17th of November: At least, I think it could not happen later than the year above-cited in this reign; because Effex's violent courses throughout the remainder of it, allow of no opportunity or countenance for his farther appearance at those entertainments: and, as for the preceding birth-days, Effex seems not have been spirited up by his incendiaries enough for raising such a division or party, as appeared upon this occasion, till the last year, when they return'd from the island voyage; and then it must have happen'd during the sitting of the parliament, which may not be so probable. Therefore, I shall here recite the scatter'd circumstances I have met with, relating to this event, till I am better inform'd in what year more certainly to fix it.

THESE martial exercises were the justs or turnaments wherewith the most active nobles and cavaliers of those times celebrated the queen's birth-day every year, in the Tilt-yard, near her palace at Whitehall. Here her majesty was commonly herself a spectator of them, with her attendants of both sexes; as likewise all the foreign ambassadors, and a numerous concourse besides both of the court and city. History has not been very particular of Raleigh's appearance at those assemblies; as by what colour or impresses he distinguish'd himself, with what success he ran the careers, or what favours he bore away: but, as upon all other publick occasions, he made a most rich and splendid figure; so we find, upon these days of triumph, none surpass'd him in military bravery. I have somewhere read of his curious fine armory; and, as I remember, that part of it is, or was preserv'd in the Tower of London; but it is more apparent that, probably for some of these grand entertainments, he either made himself, or was presented by his royal mistress with, a suit of armour all of solid silver: for there are still in being, not only ancient paintings, representing him about this part of her reign in that glittering and war-like habiliment, as hereafter will be farther described; but mention is also made in some writings of his being thus arm'd at all points, and shining in those polish'd plates of silver<sup>a</sup>. Yet who were his competitors, and what his success in these robust exercises, there is little, I fear, remaining to satisfy us, more than those dark and dispersed hints of that extraordinary opposition or contention which Effex rais'd against him about this time, as was observed: and this being the original or copy of a like contrivance, practis'd not long before or after it in France (by marshal Biron, as I remember to have read) may, from thence, and the corresponding testimony of an author, whose credit and intelligence are not to be doubted, be presumed to have happen'd in the following manner.

ABOUT the time that Effex, by other like instances of his incurable humour to monopolize the multitude, fell into, or confirmed, the queen's displeasure, he had by some of his followers learnt, that Sir Walter Raleigh, with a very gallant train, gorgeously accoutred, was to make his appearance the next tilting-day in orange-colour plumes. Hereupon Effex provided a much more numerous cavalcade, and deck'd them out exactly in Raleigh's colours: then the earl himself appearing at the head of all, arm'd cap-a-pee in a compleat suit of orange-colour, not only pass'd for the sole knight or champion of that distinction, by drowning all distinction in Sir Walter Raleigh, but thereby incorporated him and his train only as so many more of his own esquires, pages, and other retinue or servants, who made up the parade upon these occasions. The earl of Clarendon certainly points at this malignant stratagem, where, speaking of those dangerous indiscretions which were the harbingers of Effex's ruin, he mentions among them "His glorious feather-triumph; when he caus'd two thousand orange-tawney feathers, in despite of " Sir Walter Raleigh, to be worne in the Tilt-yard, even before her majesty's own face<sup>b</sup>." But it must have been somewhat surprizing to see them enter the lists, and orange-tawney running against itself. Yet the earl's success, which is also come to light, seems not to have been much regretted, being so agreeable to the merit of usurpers; insomuch that it proved Raleigh's feather triumph in the conclusion. For, tho' the lord Bacon might have reason not to mention the earl's name, where he tells us a gentleman, who came to the tilt all in orange-tawney, and ran very ill, came again the next day all in green, and ran worse;<sup>c</sup> yet another author, instead of this gentleman, names Effex;<sup>d</sup> and goes on, as the lord Bacon does, with observing, that " One of the spectators hereupon asking, Why this tilter (who seem'd to be known in both “ habits) changed his colours; another answer’d, Surely because it may be reported, that there was one in green who ran worse than he in orange-colour.”

SUCH like disturbances and ill blood as these contests must have bred, might well make the queen weary of having Essex any longer about the court, and desirous of removing him to some employment where he might more commendably exercise his martial qualities. A good occasion offer’d itself in Ireland, where Tir-Oen’s rebellion had now overspread almost the whole kingdom. A consultation was therefore held for sending over the fittest person to suppress it. The lord Mountjoy was first propos’d: but Essex himself made exceptions against his want of experience and activity; alledging, Ireland requir’d a person of the first rank, who was an old general, and considerable for honour, interest and estate, to gain him respect and influence there; by which Camden thinks he would have recommended himself, and adds, that when the queen therefore resolv’d on Essex, he slightly refus’d it, advising her to some abler person; tho’, continues that historian, he had an objection ready against any person she should have named. Notwithstanding this authority, and that Essex’s smooth-tongu’d adventures were for lending spurs to the ambition that wanted a bridle,<sup>a</sup> he seems to me, by a letter of his own genuine style, in prose and verse, to the queen, at his going over in the end of March 1599, to have look’d upon the government of that kingdom as the most irksome kind of banishment, and to have enter’d upon it with the utmost aversion.<sup>b</sup> His conduct in it was answerable to the expectations of judicious men; and one of his own servants, who attended him thither, says, it was his blackest employment, that Ireland was ordain’d to be the sepulchre of his father, and the gulph of his own fortunes.<sup>c</sup>

ABOUT four months after Essex was thus disposed of, there were great apprehensions in England of an invasion; but from what quarter is not well distinguish’d: six thousand soldiers were suddenly rais’d to guard the city and queen’s person. Chains were drawn across the streets of London, watches set, and lights hung out at every man’s door for above a fortnight.<sup>a</sup> By sea sixteen or eighteen ships of the royal navy were fitted out with wonderful speed, under the command of the lord Thomas Howard, as admiral, in the Elizabeth Jonas, and Sir Walter, Vice-Admiral, in the Ark-Royal. Whether occasion’d by any mistrust the English and Spaniards had of one another, or a policy held on both sides to make peace with sword in hand, my author does not resolve; but is sure the preparation on both sides was very great, as if one expected an invasion from the other: and yet it was generally conceiv’d not to be intended by either; but that our fleet had only relation to the earl of Essex, then in Ireland, as if he had some desperate design to try his friends in England, and to be revenged of those he thought his enemies. However it was, the care and cost was not so great as necessary; for it was known, that the Adelantado had drawn, both his ships and galleys, to the Groyne; which was not usual, but upon some action intended for England or Ireland: and, seeing we were not to be surpriz’d, he diverted them afterwards to a different use. Another benefit that arose to the nation, by putting it into this sudden posture of defence, was the great dexterity and expedition wherewith it was taught to spring into arms: for the incredible speed and order of the commanders, in raising such a land army, and fitting out such a royal navy, was so admired, both by Spain, France and Holland, that all foreigners confess’d, Her majesty’s deeds in war were not heretofore more dreadful to her enemies than, now only her preparations for it. Inasmuch that, it is said, an envoy was sent by the Archduke from Brussels with overtures of peace, tho’ they did not then succeed. Whether a design’d invasion from Spain was hereby blown over, or her majesty was better satisfied about the earl of Essex, we find not; but she commanded her fleet home, after it had been about a month at sea.<sup>e</sup>

“ from spirits walled with passion, from a heart torne “ in pieces with care, grief and travel, from a man that “ hateth himself and all things else that keep him alive;
“ what service can your majesty expect, since any service “ past deserves no more than banishment and proscription “ into the curfedit of all islands? It is your rebels pride “ and succession must give me leave to ransom myself out “ of this hateful prison, out of my loath’d body; which,
“ if it happen so, your majesty shall have no cause to mis-“ like the fashion of my death, since the course of my Happy he, could finish forth his fate,

In some un haunted desert most obscure
From all society, from love and hate
Or worldly folk, then should he sleep secure;

Then wake again, and yield God ever praise:
Content with Haps and Hawks and Brambleberry,
In contemplation passing out his days,
And change of holy thoughts to make him merry.
Who, when he dies, his tomb may be a bush,
Where harmless Robbins dwell with gentle Thrush.

NEAR a month after this, Effex returned privately out of Ireland, with some of his choice friends ; one whereof, named Sir Christopher St. Lawrence, offer'd to murder the lord Gray, whom they met upon the road, and to dispatch secretary Cecyll when they came to court ; but Effex would not encourage so base an act. The queen was now at Nonfuch : hither Effex hasten'd to present himself on his knees before her, in her privy-chamber early in the morning, and when her majesty least dreamt of him, says Camden ; who adds, that she entertain'd him with some marks of her grace and favour, tho' not with that freedom he used to find. But nothing of that unseasonable surprise and fatal discovery upon this visit is mentioned either by him, or any of our other historians, which a foreigner, with the air of romance, natural to his country, reports to have then happen'd, and which I shall therefore refer to his own words. The queen indeed order'd Effex to his apartment, and there to continue, as Camden goes on ; for the earl had not only disobligh'd her before, but now given fresh provocation by leaving Ireland without her permission, and for shuffling up a truce there, which might be broke at a fortnight's warning ; whereas he might have made an effectual composition with the rebels, and was impower'd to give them a general act of indemnity. The excuses he offer'd before the council, were so unsatisfactory, and his behaviour so contemptuous, that the queen thought proper to commit him to custody ; but appointed it to be in the lord-keeper's house rather than a common prison, chiefly to obstruct the insuasions of his pernicious adherents, to whom he was so infatuated, that he could not relinquish them, tho' one of the objections, which would be raised against him, was by his own hand pre-supposed to be, the leaving of that kingdom in such an unsettled posture, and returning into this, with such a pack of swordsmen at his heels. Thus much was thought necessary here to relate of him, that it may appear, his own passions, with the counsels of his pretended friends, and not those, who were vulgarly thought his enemies, prov'd his overthrow.

His embassy to Flanders.

WHILE Effex was thus in restraint, commissioners were sent over to Bulloigne to negotiate the peace with Spain. This was in May 1600. And about the same time we find Sir Walter Raleigh was also sent, with the lord Cobham, upon an embassy concerning the same, into Flanders. Their business was kept very secret ; yet, Albert arch-duke of Austria, and governor of the Netherlands, having charged the queen of England, it seems, with relieving the Hollanders, and being likely to take some umbrage at so many persons of considerable rank going over volunteers to prince Maurice, as the lord of Northumberland, lord Rutland, and others ; secretary Cecyll wrote to the said commissioners at Bulloigne, that if the arch-duke should object in the like manner to Cobham and Raleigh, they were to return answer, “ That these had no charge, nor carried either horse or men, except some half a dozen of their own attendants ; and finding the queen so resolved to have a peace (if good conditions could be had) they obtained leave, with importunity, to see that one action (then expected) before they might despair of seeing any more of the like kind in her majesty's time.” Thus much of this matter we have in a letter of secretary Cecyll's to those commissioners. In another written by Sir Henry Neville, who was one of those commissioners, to Mr. Winwood, he mentions it as a report, that Cobham and Raleigh were gone over upon pretext to see the camp and siege of the fort Isabella near Ostend, before which prince Maurice lay ; but thinks they had some other end ; and that in England there was some alarm taken at these matters, altho' he was not worthy to know it. The said Sir Henry, in another letter to Mr. Winwood, says, that the journey of Cobham and Raleigh was not upon curiosity only ; but that they carried some message (to prince Maurice it seems) which did no harm, and that he would reveal the particulars when he was better informed of them. These three letters were written in July this year, and in the first of them we perceive Raleigh was returned into England by the fourteenth day of the said month. <sup>c</sup>

the Isle of Jersey.

WHEN he arrived at court, the government of Jersey was, it seems, vacant by the death of Sir Anthony, son of Sir Amias Paulet. The queen had many addressors for this preferment ; but she thought none so worthy of it as Sir Walter Raleigh. About six weeks after, that is, in the latter end of August, his patent was passed, with grant of the manor or lordship of Sz. Germain in the said island, and all the lands and tenements therein. <sup>a</sup> There is a learned inhabitant of this island, who in his curious and exact history of it, giving us a succession of the governors, says, “Sir Walter Raleigh came in after the Paulets, the year only before his royal mistress queen Elizabeth died; and was attainted the first year of king James: so that we were soon bereaved of the happiness we promised ourselves under so excellent a person. His bare name in the list of our governors does honour to the island.” <sup>e</sup> Yet, as the same author further observes out of the said patent, “When Sir Walter Raleigh himself had this government given him by queen Elizabeth, she struck off three hundred pounds a year from it, which she took into her own disposal; and made that great man, so renowned for his eminent services to her and to the whole nation, be contented with the remainder.” <sup>a</sup>

Essex had now been called before the council at the lord-keeper's, where, for the matters laid to his charge, he was suspended from some of his offices. But the course of penitence and resignation, which he held for a while, gave great hopes, after he had obtained his liberty, that he would recover himself also at court; till his creatures blew him up again with their poisonous counsels, and led him to expect not only a restoration to favour, but with unreasonable interest; inasmuch, that he neglected the queen's pardon, because it came not accompanied with a new grant of his lease for the farming of sweet wines, <sup>b</sup> as a noble author observes: <sup>b</sup> Who adds, “if ever that uncouth speech fell from him of the queen, which is deliver'd to us by one who was then much conversant in the secrets of the court, <sup>c</sup> that she was as crooked in her disposition, as in her carcase; all my wonder at his destruction is taken from me.” After this speech, the queen did as good as deny him the wine-licences aforesaid, as Camden relates. Then Essex threw himself open to all ill impressions, renewing the project he had begun in Ireland of removing by force his enemies at court. He curried favour with king James in Scotland, by several respectful letters; wherein he labour'd to prejudice the king against those who had any influence in the English court, and was very particular in acquainting him with the interest of his adversaries; as one of whom he failed not to set forth Sir Walter Raleigh, with the formidable power he had in the west of England, and now again in the isle of Jersey; that Cobham was warden of the Cinque-Ports; lord Burghley, president of the north, and Sir George Carew, president of Munster, in the south of Ireland: That those were places commodious for the Spaniards to land; and these, persons well-affected to the king of Spain, and altogether, with the lord-treasurer, admiral and secretary, steer'd the helm of government. Then he practis'd with the said king to send ambassadors into England, to press a publick declaration of his title to the succession, prepares instructions for that purpose, still instancing the exorbitant power of his enemies, their disaffection to the king of Scots, and great veneration for the infant. These proceedings were outwardly varnish'd over, all this while, with the gloss of conscience and religion; he won over the puritans and their preachers to his party, commiserated the afflicted condition of the papists, retained a crew of Desperado's to guard his house, and left none uncountenanc'd, who had nothing to hope for, but changes and revolutions.

Thus these ill humours kept gathering till Sunday the 8th of February following, and then broke out, as may be seen at large in our histories of these times. At court the guard was doubled, being appris'd of this eruption; and the morning it happened, Sir Walter Raleigh sent, out of particular kindness, to Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of Effex's adherents, and governor of Plymouth fort, to come in all haste to him at Durham-house to speak with him, and, as the more private way, that he would come by water. Gorges, in the Manuscript he writes to vindicate himself from the imputation of betraying Effex by this meeting, avers, that he advertised his lordship of this message, and that upon council the earl was willing he should go; but directed him to appoint his meeting with Raleigh upon the Thames, and not to land at Durham-house; also to take with him a guard for securing his return. The conference that passed between them, as Gorges relates it, was only this: "When Sir Walter Raleigh's boat came to me, he being all alone, and I having two gentlemen, he told me, that he had sent for me to admonish me to make all haste out of the town down to my charge; there being a warrant out for the sending me to the fleet. For his kind advertisement I gave him thanks; but told him withal, because I knew the present occasion would soon discover itself, that it came too late; for I had engaged myself in another matter. He further inquiring of me, what it was? I told him, there were two thousand gentlemen who had resolved that day to live or die free-men. He protested unto me he heard not of it until that morning, but did not see what they were able to do against the queen's authority. My answer was, it was the abuse of that by him and others, which made so many honest men resolve to seek a reformation thereof. His reply was, that no man is without a colour for his intent; and advised me to look to myself, and to remember my duty and allegiance. I answer'd, that I knew not any man who did not more respect his allegiance than his life, as the end would make apparent; and thus we parted; he to the court, and I to Effex-house." <sup>d</sup> In the confession made by this Gorges, eight days after that of their insurrection above-named, before some of the privy-council, it appears, Sir Christopher Blount had persuaded him to murder or seize Sir Walter Raleigh at this meeting upon the water. <sup>e</sup> For not doing either, Gorges apologizes in the Manuscript aforesaid after this manner. "If it be demanded of me why I did not then take Sir Walter Raleigh. First, it was not a matter I ever propos'd; tho' many persuaded me so to do. Secondly, I never held it an act fitting among men to betray any that repose trust in us; and he putting himself into my hands, with what honesty could I have avowed so barbarous a deed, unless he had given me the first occasion by violent deeds or unkind words; for either of which, I was both resolved and prepared. And at my return, I deliver'd unto my lord what had passed between Sir Walter Raleigh and myself, which he received with applause, as may be testified by those who were present, and yet alive." <sup>f</sup> Lastly, in another part of the said Manuscript, Gorges says, "The reason why I acknowledge I had means to have taken or killed Sir Walter Raleigh was, the better to make it appear, that there was neither malicious or butcherous course intended to him or any; and also to give him cause to acknowledge himself in that respect beholden unto me; whereby to take from him occasion to exercise his power (which I knew to be great at that juncture) to my ruin. For I did believe, he could not in reason be so void of human respect, as not to requite one courtesy with another; as also it was no matter of treason against her majesty, but rather a manifestation of the contrary, approving this intent to be particular against Sir Walter Raleigh, and others." <sup>g</sup> This is the conference which passed between them a few hours before the insurrection, as Gorges has represented it.

AFTER Effex, with his party, had made several excursions, and some persons had been slain both on his side and the queen's. After he had been proclaimed a traitor by the king of arms in several parts of the city; and was driven, by water, to seek garrison in his own house; we find Raleigh mentioned among the several nobles and knights who invested it; tho' he appears in no particular action against the said earl or his company. But, when the earl soon after surrender'd himself, and was brought to examination, he profess'd that he was to have been assaulted or assassinated by his private enemies; of this we have the following account publish'd by authority. "As in all former contentments, he had gone the beaten path of traitors, turning their imputation upon counsellors and persons of

“ credit with their sovereign : so now he was forced to descend to the pretext of a private “ quarrel ; giving out, how that evening, when he should have been called before the lords of “ the council, there was an ambuscade of musketeers placed upon the water, by the device of “ my lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh, to have murder’d him in the way as he pass’d. <sup>A Slander’d by</sup>
 “ matter of no probability (continues my author) those persons having no such desperate estates <sup>Effex.</sup> “ or minds as to ruin themselves and their posterity by committing so odious a crime. On the “ contrary, it was certain, Sir Ferdinando Gorges accused Blount of persuading him to kill, or “ at least apprehend Sir Walter Raleigh ; and that Gorges rejecting this advice, Blount sent four “ shot after him in a boat, which Blount deny’d not ; and asked Raleigh forgiveness for it at “ the time of his death.” <sup>a</sup> But there were other improbabilities to discredit this slander (as we may safely call it, since the state call’d it by a grosser name) besides that the persons so accused had reputations and estates better establish’d, than to overthrow them by such a detestable deed ; “ as Effex’s declining to produce or name any author of such an information : be“ sides his varying from himself (like the judges, in the story of Susannah, from one another) “ in the place ; as one while he was to have been murder’d in his bed ; and another, on the “ water : also in the time and persons ; as that it was to have been done by Jesuits, and some “ days before : so that in the end, this accusation by Effex was resembled to the action of Pi- “ sistratus, who proceeded so far in this kind of fiction and dissimulation, that he lanced his “ own body, and came wounded before the people, as tho’ he had been assaulted by his “ private enemies ; thus obtained a guard about his own person, whereby he afterwards usurped “ upon the state.” <sup>b</sup> Further, what may perfectly clear up the innocence of Cobham and Ra- <sup>Cleared.</sup>
leigh from this unworthy calumny, is the acknowledgment which Blount made at his own trial ;
 when, being asked by secretary Cecyll, “ Whether he thought my lord Cobham and Sir Wal- “ ter Raleigh intended any such assassination of the earl ? he answer’d, that he did not believe “ they ever meant any such thing, nor that the earl himself feared it ; only, it was a word cast
 “ out to colour other matters.” <sup>c</sup> And lastly, what may tend to prove, that Raleigh did rather compassionate and incline to befriend the earl, than harbour any enmity that was implacable against him, is, that one of the earl’s own faction, captain Thomas Lee, should have such hopes, that Raleigh might be persuaded into the danger of disobliging the queen by importunity, or other violent means, for retrieving both Effex and Southampton from the jaws of death, as, by way of proposition, to tell Sir Robert Crofts, who had been an old officer under Raleigh in several engagements at sea, “ That Sir Walter Raleigh might get himself eternal honour and love, “ more than ever he can otherwise, if he would procure her majesty’s warrant to free the lords ; “ which he might compass, by undertaking her person :” <sup>d</sup> for this does not only shew the opinion that was held of Raleigh’s power with the queen, but the probability that he might be induced to exert it for the rescue of those noblemen. We find he did use his interest for some <sup>Procures a</sup> who were drawn in unawares, and got a pardon for Sir Edmund Bainham ; also for John Little- <sup>pardon for</sup> ton, and Orell a brave old foldier : the two former were men of fortune, and their purses might <sup>some of the</sup> bleed, or be threaten’d upon this occasion. But, as Camden observes, few paid the fines laid <sup>confederates.</sup> on them.

ON the 19th of February, Effex was arraign’d at Westminster ; and we find, in his trial, that Sir Walter Raleigh, with forty of the queen’s guard, was, as captain thereof, there present upon duty. <sup>e</sup> Raleigh was here examin’d about the conference before-mention’d ; and all he said was, “ That Gorges told him on the water, Effex had put himself into a strong guard at his “ house ; and this would be the bloodiest day’s work that ever was ; wishing he would speed
 “ to court for the prevention of it ; and that he himself wished Gorges to refuse their company, “ else he would be undone.” This is all Raleigh said of that conference ; which Gorges, here also in court, confirm’d. But Effex seems to charge Gorges with prevarication, where he replies, “ Whatsoever Sir Walter Raleigh hath said, differeth altogether from that which Sir Fer- “ dinando told us at Effex’s house, upon his return from the water.” And indeed it is not likely he should tell Effex he advised Raleigh to go to court and prevent the insurrection. Six days after, Effex was beheaded in the Court-yard of London Tower. Among the many persons of distinction, there present was Sir Walter Raleigh, probably in his charge again as captain of the guard. He stood near the scaffold, according to his own assertion; that he might better answer, if Effex should be desirous of speaking to him. But his enemies expounded his presence there in such a barbarous sense, says Camden, as if he had pressed near the place of execution, only to feast his eyes with the tragedy of the earl's sufferings; and the greatest or most notorious of Raleigh's enemies (who is known to us) he who betrayed him to his own untimely end, as will be observ'd, did after Raleigh's death, when he could not answer for himself, insinuate, that he not only insulted upon Effex being dead, but even plotted his downfall, as that "he had called the earl's faintship in question," had writ in some letters, "that the great boy died like a calf, and like a craven;" and that, soon after the execution, a gentleman, returning from Spain, touched at Sherborne, who, being asked by Raleigh, "what they said in Spain of Effex's death?" answered, "They had not heard of it; but he was sorry to hear, that in the Island voyage the earl had brought him to his mercy;" to which, that Raleigh answer'd, "but I trust I am now quit with him;" and, as a more evident demonstration, says, that the night before the earl's suffering, "Raleigh gave instructions to the lieutenant of the Tower for the execution of the warrant:" which surely he did not do without authority. But these particulars, it must be observed, come from the person stigmatiz'd with having ensnared Raleigh to his destruction, and to the person who destroyed him, with endeavour to palliate the conduct of both to the world.<sup>a</sup> And as we find those obloquies gave not satisfaction to their author's contemporaries: so we have produced them, that they may not escape the reception they deserve of posterity. As for Raleigh's comportment to Effex, we may guess what it was while the earl was alive, since he made no exceptions to it at his death, when he had free liberty of speech; and when Raleigh came to the same end, it appears by his last words, that he had relented more at the earl's fate, than any thing we hear of in his pretended friends; and that he retir'd from the sight of the earl at the time of his death, in compliance with the misconstruction of the populace, tho' he afterwards repented it; since the earl had a desire to see and speak with him before he took his farewell of the world.

Blount asks
ness.

THIS desire was, in all probability, to ask Raleigh forgiveness, for having so dishonourably treated and traduced him, to countenance his own rash purposes. For just such a desire had Sir Christopher Blount, when his own execution approached on the 18th of March following at Tower-hill; where, understanding that Raleigh, as captain of the guard, was near the scaffold, he said, "Sir Walter Raleigh, I thank God that you are present: I had an infinite desire to speak with you, to ask you forgiveness e're I died; both for the wrong done you, and for my particular ill intent towards you: I beseech you forgive me." Raleigh answer'd, "that he most willingly forgave him, and besought God to forgive him, and to give him his divine comfort; protesting before the Lord, that whatever Sir Christopher Blount meant towards him, for his part, he never bore him any ill intent:" and further said to him, "I pray you, without offence, let me put you in mind, that you have been esteemed not only a principal provoker and persuader of the earl of Effex in all his undutiful courses, but especially an adviser in that which has been confess'd, of his purpose to transport a great part of her majesty's army out of Ireland into England, to land at Milford, and thence to turn it against her sacred person: you will do well to tell the truth herein, and to satisfy the world." Blount reply'd, "When I was brought from Reban to Dublin, and lodg'd in the castle; his lordship and the earl of Southampton came to visit me; and he began thus plainly with me: That he intended to transport a choice part of the army of Ireland into England, and land them in Wales, at Milford, or thereabouts: and so securing his descent, would gather such other forces, as would enable him to march to London." I answer'd, "I would that night consider of it." Next day the earls came again; I told them, "Such an enterprize, as it was most dangerous, would cost much blood; so as I could not like it. But I rather advised him to go over himself, with a good train, and make sure of the court, than make his own conditions; and tho' we never resolved to hurt her majesty's person, yet I know, and must confess, If we had failed of our ends, we should, rather than have been disappointed, even have drawn blood from herself." Then giving a few farther hints of their progress in general, he leaves the rest to his confessions made before the privy-counsellors, whom he names, and to whom he beseeches Sir Walter Raleigh to commend him for their favourable and charitable dealing. Lastly, having also declared he died in the Catholic faith, and bid farewell to the lords Gray, Compton, and the rest, he made a decent end.<sup>a</sup> Thus have we connected all the passages of Essex's insurrection, wherein we have found Raleigh any ways mention'd or concern'd; which, with several other remarkable parts of his story, those authors, who had read many of the tracts, letters, records, and other manuscripts whence it is here drawn out, have visibly curtail'd and suppress'd in their annals and chronicles of this reign, which were publish'd in the next.

THE following summer, in the year 1601, it appears, that Raleigh attended upon the queen in her progress; and, when the king of France came to Calais, on the alarm of the archduke's besieging of Ostend, her majesty was at Dover. Ambassadors were sent over to each other on this occasion; and, in that private dispatch of the marquis of Rosney, afterwards duke of Sully, related only by himself, we find, that upon his landing at Dover, he was received by Raleigh, in company with the lords Cobham, Sidney, and others.<sup>b</sup> The interview, then expected between these two princes, was not brought to pass; nor seem the proposals, made to her majesty about the war with Spain, to have had the full effect that was hoped for; because, not long after, on the 5th of September, there arrived at London another ambassador from France, named the duke of Biron, with a very noble, numerous and stately equipage, to the number of three or four hundred persons. The queen was then in Hantsbire; and, during the thirteen days she was entertained at Basing, the marquis of Winchester's seat, the duke of Biron, with his retinue, was brought to the Vine, a fair house in the said county of the lord Sandys, which was furnish'd with seven score beds by the neighbouring gentry, and with all other accommodations from the queen's palaces, for the reception of the said ambassador. I leave this entertainment to the description of the French and English historians, who observe it was one discontinued festival, and that the like was never made by any of our princes in a progress. 'Tis more particularly to be expected, that Raleigh did here attend upon the court, because he was commonly appointed to entertain the foreign ministers, especially of France or the States, being so well acquainted with those people and their policies: and when the queen left the country, we find, among the ten persons she there knighted (a greater number than ever she had confer'd that honour upon at one time) that one of them was Carew,<sup>c</sup> the brother of Sir Walter Raleigh. But as for that passage, in a French historian lately quoted, between the queen and the ambassador when they were in London, of her shewing him, among the heads of those rebels which were stuck upon the Tower, that of the earl of Essex;<sup>d</sup> it has been proved fabulous by Camden,<sup>e</sup> who would doubtless have detected other such falsities in the said French author, relating to our English History, and in particular to Sir Walter Raleigh, had his Annals extended to the year, in which we shall be obliged to take notice thereof.

Soon after the queen's return from this progress, her last parliament met at Westminster, and that was on the 27th day of October. This was a session full of important business, and Raleigh appears frequently engaged in it. The first or most ancient list of the members of the house of commons, at least extant, is, as I have been told by an eminent antiquary, that which we have of this parliament;<sup>f</sup> and herein it appears, that Sir Walter Raleigh was one of the knights of the shire for the county of Cornwall, John Arundell, Esq; being the other; and that Sir Carew Raleigh was one of the burgesses for Foway in the same county. The first speech we have of Sir Walter's, upon record in this parliament, was on November the 4th; and in opposition to the act for sowing of hemp, "For my part, said he, I do not like this constraining

“ of men to manure or use their ground at our wills ; but rather let every man use his “ ground to that which it is most fit for, and therein use his own discretion. For halsters, “ cables, cordage, and the like, we have plentifully enough from foreign nations ; and we “ have countries here in England that make use thereof in abundance : and the bill of Tillage “ may be a sufficient motive to us in this case, not to take the course that this bill intends. For “ where the law provides, that every man must plough the third part of his land ; I know “ divers poor people have done so, to avoid the penalty of the statute, when their abilities have “ been so poor, that they have not been able to buy feed-corn to sow it withal ; nay, they “ have been fain to hire others to plough it ; which, if it had been unplough’d, would have “ been good pasture for beasts, or might have been converted to other good uses.”<sup>a</sup> Upon this motion, all the house bid away with the bill : but it was put to the question, whether it should be committed or no ? Some doubt arising, the house was divided ; and the Yea’s were 103, the Noes 162 : so the bill was not committed. It was afterwards put to the question for ingrossing ; and, notwithstanding Mr. Comptroller’s speech for the weight of it (which is not preserved) it was deny’d, and so absolutely rejected. Three days after, Sir Walter Ralegh was at the committee in the house, touching the subsidy. Here he moved them to consider for what intent they came thither, and now in their coming, what was to be consider’d. “ For the “ subsidy, said he, the manner and quality thereof, I will now only intimate thus much to you ;
 “ that the last parliament, only three subsidies were granted, upon fear that the Spaniards were “ coming ; but now we see they are come, and have set foot even in the queen’s territories “ already ; therefore, are the more of us to be respected and regarded. And seeing the sale “ of her majesty’s own jewels ; the great loans her subjects have lent her, yet unpaid ; the continual “ selling of her lands, and decaying of her revenues ; the sparing even out of her own purse “ and apparel for our own sakes, will not serve ; but she must yet be fain to call her court of “ parliament for our advice and aid in this case ; I wish, for my part, as a particular member “ of the common-wealth, that we may not do less than we did before ; and that we may also “ bountifully, according to our estates, contribute to her majesty’s necessities, as they now stand.”
 This speech was confirm’d by many other members, and met with no opposition that we read of. But the manner of raising this subsidy created some short debate ; in which Sir Francis Hastings moved, that the three pound men might be exempted ; and all others, above that rate, to pay according to the rate, to make up a full subsidy. To this Sir Walter Ralegh answer’d, “ If all pay, none will be aggrieved ; if any be exempted, doubtless it will breed much grief ;
 “ the feeling will be great to those three pound men that will feel any thing, but it will be no “ thing to them that know any thing.” Sir Edward Hobby, who, it seems, sat near the door, not hearing well this speech, said, “ You should speak standing, that the house might hear “ you.” Ralegh answer’d, “ That being in a committee, he might speak sitting or stand“ ing :” so (without rising) repeated his former words. In the end this proposal was agreed to, and secretary Cecyll reported to the whole house, “ that most voices concluded, there should “ be no exception of the three pound men, because, according to their rate, some were assess’d “ under value ; besides, separation might breed emulation, suspicion of partiality and confu“ sion.” Yet when Cecyll, among those who lanced out,<sup>b</sup> carried the matter so high, as to say, “ that neither pots or pans, nor dish nor spoon, should be spared, when danger is at our “ elbows ; nor would by any means have the three pound men excluded, because he’d have the “ king of Spain know, how willing we are to sell all in defence of God’s religion, our prince
 “ and our country ;” and when Mr. Francis Bacon, in his speech, concluded it was “ Dulcis “ tractus pari jugo ; therefore the poor, as well as the rich, not to be exempted :” Ralegh did answer ; “ I like it not, that the Spaniards, our enemies, should know of our selling our pots “ and pans to pay subsidies ; well may you call it policy, as an honourable person alledg’d ;
 “ but I am sure it argues poverty in the state. And for the motion that was last made, Dulcis “ tractus pari jugo : call you this par jugum, when a poor man pays as much as a rich ? and “ peradventure his estate is no better than it is set at, or but little better ; while our estates are “ three or four pounds<sup>c</sup> in the queen’s books, and it is not the hundredth part of our wealth ;

<sup>b</sup> Of whom, none more remarkable than serjeant Heale ; who marvelled much the house should demur upon granting the subsidy, or in the time of payment ; “ When all “ we have, said he, is her majesty’s ; and she may law“ fully, at pleasure, take it from us : yea, she has as “ much right to all our lands and goods, as to any revenue of her crown.” At which the house humm’d and laugh’d. “ Well, all your humming, said the serjeant, “ shan’t put me out of countenance.” So to mend the matter, he told them, “ he could prove his former position “ in the time of king Henry III. k. John, k. Stephen, “ &c.” At this, the house was louder than before, till they humm’d the serjeant into his seat ; but he was afterwards more particularly expos’d for these slavish principles.

pounds, in Sir Simon Devereux, fol. 633.

“ therefore it is neither dulcis nor par.” This might flow as well from the natural source of his own benignity, as from any compliance with the queen’s inclination to favour the poorer sort, for whom Raleigh seems, by her command, to have before indeed been a chosen advocate :<sup>a</sup> but he knowing, as well as the rest of the members, by former experience, that such a supply, as her majesty now wanted, being no less than three hundred thousand pounds, according to Cecyll’s representation, could not be raised, if such an exemption were admitted of; the former proposition prevail’d, and the three pound men were necessarily included.

WHEN the complaint against monopolies was made on the 20th of November, and Dr. Bennet mention’d that of cards, I can’t perceive how it could be justly observed in the journals, to make any change in the countenance of Sir Walter Raleigh; since in the same journals it is also observed, that the patent for cards was now granted to Edward Darcy.<sup>b</sup> But, when Mr. Martin spoke of a “ country that groaned under the burthen of monstrous and unconscionable “ substitutes to monopolitans of starch, tin, fish, cloth, oil, vinegar, salt, and what not.” Sir Walter Raleigh reply’d, “ I am urged to speak in two respects; the one, because I find myself “ touched upon in particular; the other, in that I take some imputation and slander to be “ offered unto her majesty: I mean by the gentleman who first mention’d tin. For that being “ one of the principal commodities of this kingdom, and being in Cornwall, it has ever (so “ long as there were any) belonged to the dukes of Cornwall; and they had special patents of “ privilege. It has pleased her majesty freely to bestow on me that privilege, and that patent; “ being word for word the very same the duke’s is. And because, by reason of my office of “ Lord-warden of the Stannaries, I can sufficiently inform this house of the state thereof, I will “ make bold to deliver it unto you. When the tin is taken out of the mine, and molten and “ refin’d, then is every piece, containing a hundred weight, sealed with the duke’s seal. And <sup>In right of his patent for the pre-emption of tin.</sup> “ by reason of this privilege (which I now have) he ever had the refusal in buying thereof; “ for the words of the patent are, Nisi nos emere volumus. Now I will tell you, that before “ the granting of my patent, whether tin were but at seventeen shillings, and so upward to fifty “ shillings a hundred; yet the poor workman never had but two shillings a week, finding him- “ self: but since my patent, whosoever will work, be tin at what price soever, they have four “ shillings a week truly paid: there is no poor that will work there, but may, and have that “ wages.” But, notwithstanding his merit, as well as right, Raleigh concluded, saying, “ Yet if “ all others may be repeal’d, I will give my consent as freely to the cancelling of this, as any “ member of this house.” It is noted, that a great and uncommon silence followed this speech. At last Sir Francis Hastings said, in respect thereto: “ I joy to see so great a reformation, that “ we may speak quietly, and be heard peaceably; every man has not alike sense or judgment, “ neither is every man’s memory alike. I wish, that if any gentleman, who speaks of this, “ or any other subject as curious, shall let fall any word amiss or unpleasing, that it may be “ attributed rather to earnestness, than want of duty.” Throughout the further proceedings against the numerous monopolies now in force, we find not any mention made of his patent aforesaid, among those which were particularly promis’d to be revok’d or abolish’d as grievances to the state. On the 24th of November, Sir Edmund Morgan and Mr. Pemberton, both members of the house, being served with subpœnas to appear in the court of Chancery, the same day, at the suit of Sir Walter and Sir Carew Raleigh, they had the privilege granted them. The officers, who served those subpœnas, were taken into the custody of the serjeant, but soon released, upon pleading they knew not those gentlemen to be members of parliament.<sup>c</sup> This is all I find of that suit concerning Sir Walter Raleigh. On the 2d of December, he spoke <sup>And against the defects of a bill for re-forming of inns.</sup> against the defects and hardships in a bill that was read for reformation of abuses in inns; as that, “ it would deprive those, who, by their lordships or manors, had right to enquire into “ the defaults of selling liquors by full measure, of their privilege; that, by disabling a man “ for ever after of being an inn-keeper, how detrimental it might be to the inheritance of “ those who had inns, some at a hundred pounds per annum; and how dangerous to inn-keep- “ ers, who might, by the negligence of a servant, suffer: all which he left to the discretion “ of the house.”<sup>d</sup> After other like objections, by another member or two, we hear no more of it. Soon after, the means of suppressing the pirates of Dunkirk, now grown strong both in arms and shipping, came under the consideration of this house. As one remedy against them, it was propos'd, to restrain the transportation of ordnance, and a bill to prohibit the same was read a second time on the 8th of December; but, before it was committed, there pass'd many speeches upon this important argument. It seems, a patent for transporting them had been granted to Sir Henry Nevill, and the queen's duty thereby rose to three thousand pounds a year; yet this profit no ways ballanc'd the inconveniences. For, being carried into all countries that were friends with Dunkirk, and confederates with Spain, the Spaniards had such plenty, that they now usually sold a hundred weight of iron ordnance for seven ducats and a half. The laws were moreover urg'd in 33 of Henry VIII, and 2 of Edward VI, which prohibited the transporting of gun metal; and tho' guns were not then made of iron, they now were; therefore it was within the power of those laws. Sir Walter Ralegh, in approbation of this motion, said,

<sup>a</sup> Sir Walter, speaking of a parliament in the reign of king Richard II, wherein a subsidy was given only by the better sort, and the commons spar’d, says (in the person of a justice of peace) “ I myself once moved it in “ parliament, in the time of queen Elizabeth, who de- “ fired much to spare the common people, and I did it by “ her commandment; but, when we call up the subsidy-

“ I am sure heretofore one ship of her majesty's was able to beat ten Spaniards; but now, by reason of our own ordnance, we are hardly match'd one to one. And, if the Low Countries should either be subdued by the Spaniard, or yield unto him upon a conditional peace, or shall join in amity with the French, as we see them daily inclining, I say, there is nothing does so much threaten the conquest of this kingdom, as the transportation of ordnance; and therefore I think it a good and speedy course to proceed by way of petition, lest we be cut off from our desires, either by the Upper House, or before, by the shortness and sudden ending of the parliament.”<sup>a</sup> The generality agreed with him in the needfulness of restraining this privilege; however, they proceeded by way of bill, which pass'd the commons, but not the lords; for other business interfering, it fell asleep till the end of the session, and then the speaker Crook, who was to represent it to her majesty, forgetting his promise, it came to nothing.

For repealing the statute of tillage.

ON the 9th of December the dispute was renew'd, whether the statute of tillage should be continued? This statute was made in the time of dearth, and Sir Walter Ralegh agreed with

<sup>a</sup> Sir Walter Ralegh has also written upon this subject in two or three places. In his discourse, touching a war with Spain, and the protecting of the Netherlands, written not long after he made the aforesaid speech, having told king James how he remember'd, that within these thirty years, two of her majesty's ships would have commanded one hundred sail of theirs; and that when he was a captain in Ireland, a hundred foot and a hundred horse would have beaten all the force of the strongest provinces: he adds, “ but of late I have known an Easterling fight, hand to hand, with one of her majesty's ships; and that the Irish have, in this last war, overthrown with even or far less number. The Netherlands (continues he) in those days, had wooden guns, and the Irish had darts; but the one is now furnish'd with as great a number of English ordnance as ourselves, and the other with as good pikes and muskets as England hath.” See Ralegh's three Discourses, 8vo. 1702, p. 16. In another discourse he afterwards writ, touching a marriage between prince Henry of England, and a daughter of Savoy, speaking of the Netherlands, he has these words; “ Whereas, in my time, I have known one of her majesty's ships command forty of theirs to strike sail; they will now undertake us one to one, and not give us a good morrow: they master us both in their number and in their mariners; and they have our own ordnance to break our own bones withal. We had reason to help them; but not to help them up to that height, as to make them able to tread upon our own heads.” Thus in the old MS. of that discourse, communicated by the noble earl of Oxford. Lastly, in another discourse Sir Walter Ralegh wrote after this, I mean that on the invention of Shipping, he has more copiously argued upon this head. These arguments I shall here also annex, both as what will exemplify the constancy of his judgment, and prove the genuineness of these discourses; tho' two of them are posthumous publications, and the other was never publish'd. “ There is no state, says he, grown in haste, but that of the United Provinces, especially in their sea-forces; and by a contrary way to that of France, or Spain; the latter by invasion, the former by oppression. For I myself may remember, when one ship of her majesty's would have made forty Hollanders strike sail, and to come to anchor; they did not then dispute de mari libero; but readily acknowledg'd the English to be Dominii maris Britannici.” And a little further: “ But whence comes this dispute? not from the encrease of numbers, not because our neighbours breed more mariners than we do, nor from the greatness of their trade in all parts of the world; for the French creep

“ into all corners of America as they do, and the Spaniards and Portuguese employ more ships by many (fishing trades excepted) than the Netherlands: but it comes from the detestable covetousness of such particular persons as have gotten licences, and given way to the transporting of English ordnance. Fuit hæc sapientia quondam, publica privatis secernere, sacra profanis; and that in so great abundance, that not only our good friends, the Hollanders and Zelanders, have furnished themselves, and have them lying on their wharfs to sell to others; but all other nations have had from us, not only to furnish their fleets, but to garnish all their forts and other places, fortifying their coasts; without which, the Spanish king durst not have dismounted so many pieces of brass in Naples, and elsewhere, to arm his great fleet in 1588. But it was directly proved in the lower house of parliament, Anno . . . . of queen Elizabeth, that there were landed in Naples above 140 Culverins English; since which time, and not long since, it is lamentable that so many have been transported into Spain. But those belike who then determin'd it, and the transporters, have now forsaken the country; and tho' the procurers remain, I am resolv'd they also have forsaken the care of his majesty's estate, and the honour of this nation. I urge not this point, as thinking it unfit to furnish his majesty's good friends and allies, who have had with us one common enemy for many years. But all politic states have well observed this precept, Ut sic tractarent amicum, tanquam inimicum futurum; for, what are all the ships in the world to be valued at, other than a company of floating tubs, were they not furnish'd with ordnance, either to offend others, or defend themselves? If a ship of 1000 tons had in her 1000 musketeers, and never a great gun; with one Cumster, carrying ten or thirteen Culverins, she may be beaten to pieces, and her men slaughter'd. Certainly the advantage, which the English had by their bows and arrows in former times, was never so great as we might now have had by our iron ordnance, if we had either kept it within the land, kept it from our enemies, or imparted it to our friends moderately: for, as by the former, we obtained many notable victories, and made ourselves masters of many parts of France; so by the latter, we might have commanded the seas, and thereby the trade of the world itself. But we have now, to our future prejudice, and how far to our present judice I know not, forged hammers, and deliver'd them out of our hands to break our own bones withal.” See Judicious and select Essays by Sir Walter Ralegh. 8vo. 1650, p. 27, 32, &c.

those who were for having it now repeal'd. His reason for it was, because " many poor men " are not able to find seed to sow to much ground, as they are bound to plough, which they " must do, or incur the penalty of the law. Besides, all nations abound with corn. France
 " offer'd the queen to serve Ireland with corn for sixteen shillings a quarter, which is but two " shillings the bushel; if we should sell it so here, the ploughman would be beggar'd. The " Low-countryman and the Hollander, who never sow corn, have, by their industry, such plen" ty, that they will serve other nations. The Spaniard, who often wants corn, had we never
 " so much plenty, would never be beholden to the Englishman for it, neither to the Low-coun-
 " tryman, nor to France, but will fetch it even of the very Barbarian; and that which the " Barbarian has been suing for these two hundred years (I mean for traffick of corn into Spain)
 " this king, in policy, has set at liberty of himself, because he will not be beholden to other " nations. And therefore, I think, the best course is, to set it at liberty, and leave every man
 " free, which is the desire of a true Englishman." <sup>a</sup> After other speeches, it was put to the question, whether the bill of tillage should be committed? and it pass'd in the affirmative.
 But, it having pleas'd her majesty to license Mr. Dormer, under her letters patents, with a Non- obstante, this statute, to enclose three hundred acres of ground, he prayed the house to admit of this proviso; therefore it was put to the question, and carried. The Noes demanded a division of the house: whereupon Mr. Richard Martin observ'd, the Noes had always carried it in this parliament when they came to a division; many staying with the Yea's, because they would not lose their places. Sir Walter Raleigh rose to answer him; but many hurrying out to the division, he and Cecyll, it seems, took some displeasure; for, after the division, when Mr. Dormer's proviso carried it again by a majority, whereby the house was set quiet, Sir Walter Raleigh said,
 " I thought I had deserved of the house to have been heard to speak, as well as he that spake <sup>For liberty of</sup>
 " before the division; and in that I offer'd to speak, and was not heard, I had wrong: for <sup>speech.</sup>
 " him that last spake, it was out of humour, and not out of judgment. Notwithstanding, I <sup>Against an</sup>
 " think it a monopoly, and the speech to be both perswasion, and to lay a great imputation up- <sup>enclosure.</sup>
 " on the house: and this is all I would have said before."

NEXT day came on the question, whether the tax for Dover-haven should be continued by force of the statute; which was three-pence a ton for the burthen of every ship. One member, Mr. Swale, objected, that the charge amounted to at least a thousand-marks a year, yet the haven was never the better; and that it was grown a proverbial wish of any tax, that it would not continue like that of Dover-haven. But Mr. John Boys shewed the conveniency of this haven, and how many hundred pounds worth of stones were ready to repair it: Sir John For- tescue also observ'd, what large ships of burthen it would receive; how necessary it is for the passage of all merchants: as also that the tax was small, and the time might be when it would need a great tax at one time. Lastly, Mr. Comptroller having likewise express'd how imprudent it was to take away this tax, now they were debating how to defend themselves from the Dunkirkers, which would weaken the most necessary haven of England, Sir Walter Raleigh was more particular in these words: " There are divers havens which have been famous, and now
 " are grown to decay, as Timmouth, Seaton and Winchelsey; Rye is of little receipt; Sandwich
 " (as a burgh of that town, Mr. Peak, said this parliament) is even a going. The tax being <sup>For the tax</sup>
 " employed as it should be, I hold it both good and necessary; and there is no trade of fisher- <sup>to repair Do-</sup>
 " men to Newfoundland, but by this haven of Dover; which, if the tax be taken away, and <sup>ver-haven.</sup>
 " that go to decay, her majesty shall lose one of the best and most necessary havens of Eng- " land, which hath all the commodities that Mr. Comptroller shewed, and lies opposite to all
 " our enemies countries, who may soon be with us, and we not able to resist them, or help " ourselves, should we want this haven. I think it therefore fit this matter should be con-
 " sider'd of, and committed:" and so it was.<sup>b</sup>

THE 12th of December was read, the third time, a bill for the more diligent resort to church on Sundays, which produced several speeches in the house. The recusants were very numerous at this time, no less than fifteen hundred in Yorkshire, as Dr. Bennet affirm'd, which might be one reason for now urging this bill; but those, who were no ways popishly inclin'd, perceived port of Dover; being a brief discourse, declaring how honourable and profitable to her majesty, and how necessary and commodious for the realm, the making of Dover- haven shall be, and in what sort; with how little charge and great perfection the same may be accomplish'd: printed in a pamphlet, entitled, An Essay on Ways and Means to

 by Sir Henry Sherer, Knt. 4to. 1701. There was a certificate, touching Dover-haven, from Mr. William Borlough, author of several other maritime discourses, in a volume of Sir Francis Walsingham's State Papers, relating to the navy, fol. 216; as I find in his Table-book of their contents (before mention'd) p. 41.

several insufferable defects in it; as Mr. John Bond, who, among other arguments, was not for exposing the Ecclesiastical authority among their enemies, as more impotent than a twelve-penny fine. At last there was a proviso added to it, "That if any man came eight times a year to church, and said the usual divine service twice every Sunday, and holy-day in his house, with his whole family, that should be a sufficient dispensation." But the bill, weak enough of itself, was overthrown by this conjunction, after Sir Walter Raleigh had shewed, "That all the church-wardens of every shire must come to the assizes, to give information to the grand jury. Say then there be a hundred and twenty parishes in a shire, there must now come extraordinarily two hundred and forty church-wardens; and say, that but two in a parish offend in a quarter of a year, that makes four hundred and eighty persons (with the offenders) to appear: what great multitudes this will bring together! what quarelling and danger may happen, besides giving authority to a mean church-warden! how prejudicial this may be!" with divers other reasons against it, and instances of the ambiguities and equivocations in it: and as for the proviso newly added, "it was a plain toleration from coming to church; and the parson could not prevent or constrain any, if they read service at home." Hereupon it was put to the question, and the house was divided; the Yeas went forth, and were a hundred and five, and the Noes within were a hundred and six: so it was thrown out by one voice. But the Yeas urging they had the speaker's voice, which would make it even; this grew a question, whether he had a vote? Sir Edward Hobby thought he had one; but Sir Walter Raleigh argued, "that he was foreclos'd of his voice, by taking that place which it had pleased them to impose upon him; and that he was to be indifferent for both parties;" withal shewed, "that by the old order of the house, the bill was lost:" the speaker himself confirm'd his observation, and confess'd, he had not, by custom, any vote. Then Mr. Boyer, secretary to the lord-treasurer Buckhurst, would have retrieved it, by suggesting, there was some foul play; declaring, a member was pulled back by the sleeve at going out, and charged Mr. Dale of the Middle-Temple: to which Sir Walter Raleigh answer'd, in a humorous manner, "Why! if it please you, it is a small matter to pull one by the sleeve, for so I have done myself oftentimes;" which, tho' a familiar phrase for checking or reproving one's self for any weakness or error, yet a very disingenuous and incongruous construction was forced upon it by the Comptroller and Cecyll; as if, "large was his conscience, or very flexible," that, in a matter of this consequence, would be drawn backwards or forwards by the sleeve," Raleigh took no notice of them, and the speaker being allowed to have no voice, the bill was thrown up, and they took their leave of it. Besides the speeches Raleigh made in parliament, which we have thus drawn together, as far as they are upon record, he appears in the committees of many other bills, and in several conferences with the lords, as may be seen in the journal books of both houses; but being only mention'd in general, we need not here be so particular as to recite them: therefore shall only observe, that the commons, having granted the queen a liberal subsidy, and her majesty given her royal assent to nineteen publick and ten private acts, this last parliament, in her reign, was dissolv'd on the 19th of December.

IN the beginning of the year 1602, Mr. Carew's Dedication of his Survey of Cornwall is dated, as was before intimated; wherein that author has, with such energy, copied forth the most amiable distinctions of Raleigh's mind: this agreeable picture thereof, and the many other noble attitudes in which we have seen it display'd, have made me inquisitive what portraitures remained of his person, that we might better judge of the correspondence between them; how well, in one aspect, the sprightliness of genius consoorted with the solidity of judgment; how well, in one figure, the roughness of war, with the splendor and magnificence of courts. I have, at last, had the satisfaction of seeing these characters united in that portrait of Sir Walter Raleigh, still remaining with the descendants of his family.<sup>a</sup> It is a half length, representing him in the silver armour before-mention'd, and richly adorn'd in the skirts, the sword and belt with diamonds, rubies and pearls. It seems, by the darkness and fulness of the hair, with the freshness and clearness of the countenance, to have been the picture of him before his Guianian expedition above related; but the inscription, upon another very old draught in the same posture and habit, mentions his government of Jersey.<sup>b</sup> Farther, to describe this piece here, will be needless, since it is now brought into sculpture by an excellent hand, and ready to be made publick. Another painting I have also seen of him, and this is at full length; probably an original. It agrees very well with the foregoing, in the form of the face, and colour of the hair and beard; at least as far as may be expected from the hands of different artists, some alteration perhaps by repairs, and some difference of years in the object; whereby he seems, in this last, more ruddy and tann'd than the other. For, by the inscription thereon, partly still legible, it appears, that this picture was painted in this last year of the queen, above-mention'd; and that his son Walter, who is likewise here drawn by him, was then eight years of age. Further, in this picture the stature of Sir Walter Ralegh measures about six feet, is well shap'd, and not too slender: he is apparell'd in a white fatten pink'd vest, close sleev'd to the wrist; and over the body of it a brown doublet, finely flower'd and embroider'd with pearl; his belt of the same colour and ornament, in which hangs his sword; and on the other side, over the right hip, is seen the pommel of his dagger. In his hat, which he has on, is a little black feather, with a large ruby and pearl-drop at the bottom of the sprig in place of the button. His trunks or breeches, with his stockings and ribbon-garters, fring'd at the end, are all white; and buff shoos, tied with white ribbons. His son, standing under his left elbow, is fair and prettily featur'd; dress'd in a blue silk jacket and trowses, guarded down with narrow silver galloon; stockings blue, and white shoos; gloves in the right hand, hat or cap in the left, and a silver sword by his side.<sup>a</sup> A year before this, the lady Ralegh's picture was also painted, as appears by the date upon it. It is a half-length like the first, but painted on board; a high finish'd piece, in the labour'd manner of those times, by some masterly hand; has been well kept, and is doubtless an original. It represents her a fair handsome woman, turn'd perhaps of thirty. She has on, a dark colour'd hanging-sleeve robe, tufted on the arms; and under it, a close-bodied gown of white fatten, flower'd with black, with close sleeves down to her wrist; has a rich ruby in her ear, bedrop'd with large pearls; a lac'd whisk rising above the shoulders; her bosom uncover'd, and a jewel hanging thereon; with a large chain of pearl round her neck, down to her waist.<sup>b</sup> These are all the paintings I have seen of them, that I can count authentic, or most likely to bear any true resemblance. But have been credibly inform'd of a picture of Sir Walter Ralegh, in miniature, taken not long before his death; and another at large, representing him also in a white suit, which he had, beset with jewels, to the value of threescore thousand pounds; and that one diamond thereof, worth a hundred pounds, remained in the family till the beginning of the late queen's reign. In this picture there is a ribbon-garter, fring'd at the ends, ty'd about his left arm. This, according to the tradition that remains in his family, was his lady's (otherwise might be thought one of the queen's favours at the Tilt-Yard) which he brought one morning, when he was oblig'd to attend her majesty early, as a token, that, for dispatch, he had rode a hundred and twenty miles since he took leave of her late the night before. But such a number of jewels, which might be call'd extravagance in others, was no expence to Sir Walter Ralegh, who had many other kinds of treasure, as well as this in Spanish prizes, or otherwise in traffick with foreign nations; and as for his stately appearance in, by wearing of them upon some special occasions, it is not only confirm'd by circumstances, in part before-mention'd, but also by some authors; who are not expected to take notice of it with great commendation: yet the Jesuit Drexelius might perhaps have found more dazling examples to dress out his Dialogue upon Attire, nearer the time he wrote it,<sup>c</sup> and to have parallel'd with the Roman emperors he produces, than Ralegh; even tho' Sir Walter might, upon some great assemblies at court, have his very shoos bedeck'd with precious stones, that exceeded the value of six thousand six hundred pieces of gold, as that author relates.<sup>d</sup> All I think here further observable upon the pictures of Sir Walter Ralegh, is, that after so many which may be called genuine, and many more pretended to be so, still in being, there have been such frequent occasions of engraving his effigies for his books; yet we have never had, till now, more than two sculptures, which can pretend to have been taken from any paintings; that even these are different from any above describ'd; and that all the rest of the copper prints we have of him, whereof near half a score might be reckon'd, are copies only from the last of those two.<sup>a</sup>

of voyages
he set forth to Virginia.

AMONG the rest of the particulars, we shall briefly relate of Sir Walter Raleigh, in this last year of the queen's reign; a voyage, which he now set out for the supply of his colony in Virginia, is principally to be remember'd. For tho' he had made an assignment of his patent to other undertakers, as is before observ'd; yet they making no successful progress, he was so regardful of the English he had planted there, that he sent to them almost every other year, even from the time of the said assignment. For, besides the five voyages before epitomiz'd, which himself chiefly was at the expence of, for the first plantation of Virginia, we are well inform'd of five voyages more; which, since those, he set forth thither<sup>b</sup> for the relief of his countrymen, as well as for further discoveries of those parts, and alliance with the people; and that the last of these voyages, under the command of captain Samuel Mace, was made this year. In all which, Sir Walter Raleigh might very well have disburs'd forty thousand pounds, as was before observ'd; since, in a French author (lately come to hand) I have found the two first voyages only to Virginia cost him and his friends threescore thousand crowns:<sup>c</sup> yet were not the English so securely establish'd in this most promising plantation, as Sir Walter Raleigh would have had them; for, from the short account we have of this last voyage, and other circumstances, we may observe the said colony was much impair'd by the barbarous Indians, as indeed Raleigh's purse seems also to have been by these frequent communications to it. Nor was it without much blood, as well as money, that this settlement was at last fix'd by the succeeding undertakers in the next reign: and all owing to the want of that timely and competent assistance from the queen or state, whereby the most worthy attempts for the publick good were even in these, as well as other times, so generally starv'd. But Raleigh afterwards gave some emphatical reasons for this unhappiness; whence we may evidently perceive, it was to the queen's consulting so much, and relying upon the persuasions of her scribes, men unexperienc'd in all warlike or adventurous enterprizes, narrow domestick politicians, or mere courtiers, who were most constant at her ear; that she so frequently did things by halves,<sup>d</sup> as well in conquests and discoveries, as in rewards and preferments, especially of military men.<sup>e</sup>

Thus

<sup>a</sup> Of these two sculptures or prints of Sir Walter Raleigh, the first is an extraordinary rarity; insomuch, that many virtuosi and antiquaries, who have searched after, and collected the graven heads of eminent persons, for many years together, have not so much as ever heard of it: the felicity and the favour are therefore the greater, that I have been oblig'd with the sight of it by general Dormer, who has procur'd a fresh and fair impression of it from France into his choice and costly collections; for it is a French piece, in the Octavo size, and graven by Thomas Leau, an artist, who was encouraged by some of our nobility in these times for the excellence of his hand. It represents him in a close-bodied silk coat, laced; agrees pretty well in the features with those before describ'd, especially the high forehead and cornering up of the hair above the right temple. It has a compartment or group at the bottom, displaying his victory over the fleet in the bay of Cadix; yet, in the large Latin inscription, expressing his titles and offices of command, there is mention made of his government of Jersey: so I conclude it was graven between his preferment thereto, and the queen's death. The other print of him, is that which we see prefix'd to most of the editions of his History of the World, whether to the first edition I am not yet certain, the oldest that I have seen being among the heads, annexed to Henry Holland's Basilogia, was graven by Simon Pass in the year 1617, representing him in a close-bodied suit, thickly laced; a full laced ruff and truncheon in his hand: also when he was more aged and corpulent, than we see him in any of those before-mention'd. By the visible erasure of a long inscription that was at the bottom, for the substitution of that which is more brief, the plate should seem to have been graven before that year; but by the truncheon in his hand, not till he had his command as general for his last expedition; yet, being probably taken from some authentic painting, it lay most ready to be copied, when any print was wanting for his lesser works. This is all I shall here observe upon the pictures of Sir Walter Raleigh; and, for much of this, we are obliged to the knowledge and industry of the ingenious Mr. Porter.

<sup>b</sup> See an excellent discourse upon the benefits that may grow to England by American plantations, entitled, Virginia's Verger; in Purchas's Pilgrims, vol. 4.

<sup>c</sup> This particular I find in that scarce book, mention'd before in this life, fol. 34. entitled, L'Histoire Notable de la Floride, &c. 8vo. Paris 1586, dedicated by M. Basani, an eminent mathematician, A illustre et vertueux Seigneur Walter Raleigh Chevalier Anglois, &c. That editor, in this dedication, expressing, among other commendations, the laudable and unshaken constancy wherewith Raleigh persever'd, in advancing the honour and profit of his country, instances as most evident and fresh in memory, Les deux voyages faits depuis deux ans en ça, par vos vaisseaux, vers les parties occidentales; ou vous & aucuns de vos amys n'avez moins employe de Soixante Mil' escus. This dedication is followed with some Latin verses on Sir Walter Raleigh, by Johannes Auratus, the French king's poet and interpreter of the Greek tongue, an epigram in Latin, and an anagram upon Sir Walter Raleigh's name, in French, by Martin Basanier: And lastly, another Latin poem, in praise of those who had made discoveries in the new world, by Richard Hakluyt, then in France; from all which it will appear, how highly Sir Walter Raleigh was distinguish'd by his said contemporaries among and even above the preceding discoverers of unknown countries. For the sight and use of this scarce treatise among others, as well as several curious observations relating to Sir Walter Raleigh, I must acknowledge myself much beholden to the rare library and courteous communications of Sir Hans Sloane.

<sup>e</sup> "That her majesty, in her advancement of her men of war, says Sir Walter Raleigh, did sooner believe other men, than herself; a disease unto which many wise princes beside herself have been subject: I say, that such a confidence, altho' it may seem altogether to excuse her noble nature, yet can it not, but in some sort, accuse her of weakness. And exceeding strange it were, were not the cause manifest enough, that when

Thus those speculative counsellors, tho' they could not hinder brave and active spirits from budding out into noble beginnings, of most hopeful benefit to the common-wealth; yet could, by stopping the channel of supplies or encouragements, blite them from advancing to any fruitful or profitable conclusions; and this, only to bring down those of superior service and merit, to a level with themselves.

WHETHER the expence of those voyages was the cause of Sir Walter Ralegh's falling, about this time, his estate, or some part of it in Ireland, is not so expressly told us, as that it was become less advantageous to him since the late rebellion in that kingdom. But we find, that a little before Sir George Carew, now president of Munster, took the castle of Carrigfoyl Kerry, Mr. Richard Boyle (afterwards earl of Cork) not only bought a ship of Sir Walter Ralegh's, call'd the Pilgrim, but soon after the said president conquer'd Berehaven castle, he, having advised the said Mr. Boyle to buy also Sir Walter's lands in Munster, sent him into England with two letters; the one to secretary Cecyll, giving an account of Mr. Boyle's abilities, desired, that he would introduce him to Sir Walter Ralegh, and recommended him to this great man (says my author) as a proper purchaser of his said lands; the other letter was written, by Sir George Carew, to Sir Walter Ralegh himself, acquainting him, that the bearer was capable of making the purchase; and that he thought he might be willing to dispose of it, since the management thereof, in those turbulent times, gave him a great deal of trouble, and the income it produced was very inconsiderable: so, after a meeting, the bargain was struck up, and conveyances executed. These lands, soon after in the peaceable times, became a great estate to Mr. Boyle: and this purchase, as he afterwards gratefully remember'd in the Memoirs he wrote of his own life when he was earl of Cork, was the third addition and rise to his estate. <sup>a</sup>

As for the estate at Sherborne, it appears, he now settled it upon his son Walter; and that the deeds were drawn in Midsummer, this present year, for so we have it from his own words. <sup>b</sup> This settlement, as I understand it, was of the remainder of the lease for ninety-nine years: for tho' the bishop of Sarum, Dr. Henry Cotton, had the last year assign'd over to the queen, the fee and inheritance also of the said premisses, and her majesty granted the same by her letters patent to Sir Walter Ralegh before her death, yet he did not make them over to his son, till the seventh year of her successor. <sup>c</sup> The reason of settling his estate upon his son at this time, appears also to have risen from a challenge, which he had lately received from Sir Amias Preston (who had been knighted at Cadiz by the earl of Essex since we last spoke of him) and which Ralegh says himself, "he intended to answer." <sup>d</sup> The cause of their quarrel I never could meet with in print or manuscript; yet conceive Ralegh had good reason on his side, because he afterwards shewed publicly himself, how deliberate he was in his preparations for it, by sorting his writings, and how resolved, by settling his estate. <sup>e</sup> But from what excellent hands soever Dr. Fuller received his information, that, upon some distaste, Sir Amias sent Ralegh this challenge; we may be pretty certain from what Ralegh has mention'd, that the said information, or this author's account of it, is erroneous, where he adds, "that Sir Walter declin'd it." Indeed, I agree he might do so, "without any abatement to his valour, wherein he had abundantly satisfied all possibility of suspicion, and with great advancement of his judgment; for having (continues Fuller) a fair and fixed estate, with wife and children (child he should have said) being a privy-counsellor (here he mistakes again) and Lord-warden of the Stannaries;" my said author thinks, "Sir Walter looked upon it as an uneven lay to stake himself against Sir Amias, a private and single person, tho' of good birth and courage; yet of no considerable estate." <sup>f</sup> But if Ralegh did accept of the challenge, as it appears plainly he did, when he might have had such fair reasons of evasion; those inequalities

Settles his estate in England.

In a challenge.

"the prosperous actions are so exceedingly priz'd, the actors are so unprosperous and neglected. The cause, I say, which hath wrought one and the same effect in all times, and among all nations, is this; that those, who are nearell the person of princes (which martial men seldom are) can, with no good grace, commend, or at least magnify, a profession far more noble than their own: seeing therein, they should only remind their matters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving less honour and reward to men of far greater deserving, and of far greater use, than themselves." History of the World, lib. 5. cap. 6. sect. 2.

<sup>a</sup> See an extract of the said Memoirs, in the life of the late earl of Orrery, by Eustace Budgell, Esq; 8vo. 1732, p. 13, 14, 15. But, it seems, the said earl of Cork was afterwards sadly plunder'd of his great estate, for, at the breaking out of the rebellion, he was taken, and his estate was sold to another nobleman. <sup>b</sup> The same is said of Sir Walter Ralegh.

"and day, to preserve ourselves and our castles; for all we had without doors is lost; and poor I, that, besides my house, demesnes, parks, iron-works, fishings, and other commodities, had a revenue of fifty pounds per diem, cannot now truly say, that I have fifty pounds per annum in certain revenue." Thus in the earl of Cork's letter to the lord Newburgh, chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland MS. in the Harleian library, B. II. 90. C. 7. fol. 706.

in Preston will either prove Sir Walter a generous adversary, or that the injury he received from Sir Amias was indispensable. Now this representation seems to have been officiously and unnecessarily shaped to make Raleigh's actions conformable with his writings; for (continues our said author) “this is consonant to what he has written so judiciously about duels, condemning “those for ill honours where the hangman gives the garland.”<sup>a</sup> However, they were afterwards reconcil'd, as Fuller concludes; and, upon the whole, Sir Walter Raleigh seems to have shewn a much more creditable conduct herein, than Sir Francis Vere a little while before had done in the difference between him and a certain nobleman.<sup>b</sup>

Circumstances preliminary to his fall.

BUT here we are no longer to take notice of such open adversaries; for now, in the very close of this year, on the 24th of March, ends the long reign of glorious Elizabeth, and now sets the sun of Raleigh's external honour and felicity; yet, like that ever active planet, will shine resplendently to the heavens, when he is clouded or eclipsed to mankind. How he fell into this eclipse, record, the only, or greatest luminary of time past, does but dimly or doubtfully discover. All we can do, is diligently to assemble every unextinguish'd spark which darts any light this way; then see if they will afford that guidance to the truth, by being congregated, which they have not yet been observ'd to yield asunder. And first, we may remember to have before read of the prepossessions which Effex is affirm'd to have instill'd unto king James against Raleigh; and, after the earl's death, there are several circumstances implying that Cecyll did the like. For tho' Cecyll and Raleigh join'd against Effex and his faction; yet, when these were overthrown, they divided, and seem to have had a trial of skill with one another. And one author says, that “Raleigh, wanting strength, tho' not wit, to be the treasurer's rival, “perish'd, because not thought to own humility enough to be his servant; it being more safe “at court to have many enemies of equal power, than one false ambitious friend that has attained to the absoluteness of command.”<sup>c</sup> In short, Cecyll seems to have used those arts of insinuation with king James before his coming into England; to which Raleigh could not bend himself. That he then held clandestine correspondences with Scotland, is apparent from that story in Sir Henry Wotton, who tells us, “that her majesty, taking the air on Black-beath, “attended by Cecyll when the post rode by; and, hearing he came from Scotland, she called “for his packet: Cecyll, tho' he knew it contained letters, which, to discover, were as so “many serpents, yet, making more shew of diligence than doubt, to obey, called in great “haste for a knife to rip it up; but, approaching at some distance with it, he told the queen “it looked and smelled so ill favour'dly, coming out of the filthy budget, that it must needs “be air'd first, because he knew how offensive ill scents were to her majesty: so got opportunity to separate what he would not have seen,”<sup>d</sup> and she smelt nothing of the matter. One talent above the rest Cecyll was not wanting in to recommend him to this new sovereign; and this was such a faculty of discovering plots, as if he thought he should be looked on as useless without them. For, as a noble author observes, “It seemed as necessary for him, that there “should be treasons, as for the state, that they should be prevented. And, tho' he created “none, yet he fomented some conspiracies, that he might give frequent evidences of his loyalty; having not the advantage of others in person to gain estimation, therefore did it by “these eminent services:”<sup>e</sup> and as for king James, he was so apprehensive, so susceptible of such impressions, that, when he was but cross'd or disturb'd in his sports, he would charge people with treason: nay, we are particularly told by those who were otherwise friends to his memory, that his carver, once at table, giving him accidentally a nick on the finger (as he was routing in the dish) his majesty, at the sight of his own blood, could not forbear calling out treason; and that Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, was wont to make himself merry with this expression: and all this instanced, by my said author, to shew, that for any clamour of this

<sup>a</sup> This curious and copious digression against duels, which that author alludes to, is in Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, lib. V. cap. III. S. XVII. sect. 2. Sir Walter has also, in his instructions to his son, written a chapter against Private Quarrels; in which he no less wisely, than bravely, says, “Thou shalt be in as much “danger in contending with a brawler in a private quarrel, as in a battle, wherein thou may'st get honour to thyself, and safety to thy prince and country; but, if “thou be once engaged, carry thyself bravely, that they “may fear thee after.” And a little further, “I would “not have thee, for any respect, lose thy reputation, or “enlarge publick disgrace; for better it were not to live,

“than to live a coward, if the offence proceed not from thyself; if it does, it shall be better to compound it “upon good terms, than to hazard thyself; for, if thou “overcome, thou art under the cruelty of the law; if “thou art overcome, thou art dead or dishonour'd, &c.”

kind, king James's word was no slander.<sup>a</sup> But more directly to our purpose there is another writer, who, making some critical enquiry into the preliminaries of Sir Walter's fall, says, “ Sir Robert Cecyll, principal secretary of state, fearing the great abilities of Raleigh, and being wearied with the troublesome impertinences of Gray and Cobham; all which had joined with him in design against the earl of Essex, their common enemy; had done their errand to king James (whose counsels he desir'd to engross to himself alone) before his coming into England.”<sup>b</sup> And when the king was arriv'd, there was matter enough to exasperate Cecyll against Raleigh, if, through any design of recrimination, Sir Walter did present to his majesty a memorial; wherein “ he reflected heavily upon Cecyll in the matter of Essex; and, vindicating himself, threw the whole blame upon the other: further laying open (at the end thereof) the conduct of Cecyll and his father also, in the matter of the queen of Scots (his majesty's mother) bitterly charging the death of this unfortunate queen upon them.” However, says my author, “ this had no influence over the king, and only irritated Cecyll the more against Raleigh.”<sup>c</sup> But what seems sufficient to have incensed the king also against Raleigh, was his being of that party, who, in regard of the inveterate feuds between England and Scotland, desired the king might be obliged to articles; for, as another writes, “ among these noble and publick spirits, were Sir John Fortescue, Sir Walter Raleigh, the lord Cobham, &c. all frownded upon after by the king, who had yet the luck to live so long as to change his opinion, and with the number of his countrymen had been limited, and they not suffer'd, like locusts, to devour this kingdom.”<sup>d</sup> There were not wanting still other particulars, which might render Raleigh obnoxious to a man of the king's jealous disposition; for “ he had (at the time of his majesty's accession to the throne) the daughter and heir of Basset to his Ward, who was to be married to his son Walter, her estate worth three thousand pounds per annum; but she was (after his condemnation, we suppose) taken from him, and married to Mr. Henry Howard, who died suddenly at table; and she was afterwards married to the earl of Newcastle, who profess'd he would never have wedded her, if young Walter Raleigh had been alive; conceiving her, before God, to be his wife, for they were married as much as children could be.”<sup>e</sup> Now these Bassetts, as we find elsewhere, were those of Umberleigh and Heanton-Court in Devonshire; who, being descended from the Plantagenets, laid some claim at this very time of the king's entrance to the crown of England.<sup>f</sup> But whatever discountenance Raleigh might receive at his first meeting of the king, in his journey from Scotland,<sup>g</sup> whence he set out on the 5th of April 1603, and arrived at Theobalds, which was Cecyll's seat, on the 3d of May, and at London four days after; it seems not to have amounted to a peremptory dismissal from his majesty's service or presence: for we are told, “ the king used Raleigh for some weeks with great kindness, and was pleased to acknowledge divers presents which he had received from him being in Scotland; for which he gave him thanks. But, finding him a martial man, addicted to foreign affairs and great actions, he feared lest he should engage him in a war.”<sup>h</sup> That Raleigh was in company with the king;

Thus perhaps the countermand might not be particular of any person; however some, as we see, apply it to Raleigh, as others have also done to Cobham; affirming, the king check'd him for his absence from his charge at that dangerous time, being then Lord-warden of the Cinque-Ports. against the

and that some of his conversation turned upon this subject we have from his own words, where he says, “ I offer’d his majesty, at my uncle Carew’s, to carry two thousand men to invade “ the Spaniards without the king’s charge.”<sup>a</sup> And this agrees with his writing a discourse, which he did or intended to deliver to his majesty against the peace with Spain now in treaty, which seems to be the same that was a hundred years afterwards publish’d by his grandson.<sup>b</sup> Herein he advis’d his majesty to protect the Netherlands; for, says he, a poor neighbour’s house, set on fire, is to be better guarded or watched, than a great city afar off. Herein he persuades the king to deliberate, and not come to a hasty conclusion of peace with the Spaniards; for, when the house is built, it is ill mending the foundation. Herein he says, “ I dare not “ write all I desire; for I know not to whose hands these may come. This I beseech your “ majesty to know, that it proceeds from an humble and a faithful heart, which your majesty “ cannot beat from the love of your royal person and good estate.”<sup>c</sup> And lastly, I shall observe, that herein he also mentions another discourse, “ how war may be made against Spain “ and the Indies; which I will, says he, also present your majesty, if you will vouchsafe the “ reading thereof.”<sup>d</sup> but this, I think, has never appear’d in print. The former of these discourses is humbly and discreetly address’d with variety of arguments and observations from his own knowledge and experience; also strengthened with many historical examples of foreign countries, and political maxims or sentences from the ancient classics: all which he had plentifully at command in any topic he undertook to write, or even speak of: such the extensiveness of his remarks and his reading; such the felicity of his memory and talents of application. But, if reason would have prevail’d, it was not wanting also from other hands; so that Sir Walter Raleigh was not singular in his dissuasions of the king, but had the satisfaction of seeing foreigners, as well as his own countrymen, subscribe to his sentiments;<sup>e</sup> and the lord Henry Howard, tho’ otherwise brought into the court-measures, yet could not, it seems, content to these of a general pacification; therefore was, as well as Raleigh, excluded from the benefit of those rich presents, which the marquis of Rosny, ambassador from France, made to all those courtiers who promoted the same; insomuch that Howard, being asked by the king How it happen’d he had not a jewel as well as the rest? answer’d, in allusion to Esop’s fable, Non sum gallus, itaque non reperi gemmam.<sup>f</sup> The causes, which moved the king of Spain to sue for this peace, Raleigh did afterwards, with great perspicuity, lay open;<sup>g</sup> but his present opposition of it, and the consequences of that, seem to have been the hinges upon which his whole fortune now turn’d; I say, the most apparent cause to me of all those sorrows and sufferings which fill up the melancholy remains of his story. This unfortunate event, which he was above shunning, by trimming and temporising in a matter which he knew so highly concern’d the honour and advantage of his country, he has himself so excellently accounted for, where he shews the ill success which attends such sincere conduct, and how prosperity is the fruit of slavish or hypocritical compliances;<sup>h</sup> that I could not, but from the said occasion of the greatest vicissitude in his life, form the introduction to this account of it.

<sup>g</sup> Raleigh lays down five reasons for the king of Spain’s making this peace with England and the Netherlands: “ as first, his having so exhausted his treasure, that he “ was no longer able to maintain the archduke’s army. “ Secondly, the great interruption of his trade, and losses “ of his merchants, to the breaking of both his banks at “ Seville. “ Thirdly, his fear that the English and Nether- “ lands would plant in the West-Indies. “ Fourthly, to re- “ cruit his coffers, and enable himself to break into war “ again. “ Fifthly, that the English may decline, and for- “ get the passages and pilotage to the West-Indies, and “ their sea-officers may be worn out; for, except a little

“ trade for tobacco, there is not a ship that sails that way. “ and seeing the Spaniards may hang up the English, “ put them to death by torments, as they do; and that “ the English dare not offend the Spaniards in those parts. “ a most notable advantage gotten in the conclusion of “ the peace! it is certain, that the English will give over “ that navigation to the infinite advantage of the Spaniards. “ king both present and future. For these causes of im- “ portance it was, that the Catholic king sought the “ peace of England and the Netherlands; and so much all “ men of judgment discern.” See these reasons more at large in Sir Walter Raleigh’s Dialogue between a Jeſuit and a Reculant, among the genuine Remains, publish’d at the end of an abridgement of his History of the World, by Philip Raleigh, Esq; 8vo. 1700.

<sup>h</sup> In a curious discourse, where he learnedly and religiously reconciles fortune with reason and providence, Raleigh has these words. “ But it may be objected, that “ if fortune and chance were not sometimes the causes of “ good and evil in men, but an idle voice whereby we “ express success, how comes it then, that so many woe- “ thy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and “ empty-headed fools? that riches and honour are given “ to external men, and without kernel; and so many “ learned, virtuous and valiant men, wear out their lives “ in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no “ other inferior or apparent cause, besides the partiality “ of men’s affection, but the falsifying and not fixing “ ourselves according to the nature of the times wherein we “ live. For whosoever is most able, and best sufficient

THUS have we seen several circumstances, and these are all I have met with in this interval, whereby Raleigh might undesignedly and unluckily become disagreeable to a man of king James's temper ; but, on the other side, little or nothing that could so inflame Raleigh against the king, as to make him run headlong into such violent conspiracies, as could only end in his own ruin. Suppose the king did discourage Raleigh's attendance upon him at his entrance, dislike his patent for wines, or removed him from the guards, to oblige Sir Thomas Erskin, his countryman and favourite, whom he afterwards prefer'd to higher dignities ; and this is all I have met with that could give offence on the king's part : will this be thought sufficient provocation for a man of Raleigh's reason and judgment, so tender of fame and reputation, so settled in family, so well situated in his fortune, no less than three thousand pounds a year, as was confess'd at his trial, besides many other profitable, and I may say princely possessions on the seas, as well as the land, to plot commotions or insurrections ; yet enervate himself for the execution of them, by resigning, as he says himself he did, his office of chiefest power, the wardship of the Stannaries ? Nay, further, to herd with a motly and disjointed crew of priests, also with profess'd enemies to himself, not to mention knaves and fools ; and, on a sudden, resolve to turn rebel, ruffian and cut-throat ; to be the Coryphaeus, to murder the king with his own hand, and all his innocent progeny ! for this is the charge that the fertile pens of French writers have heap'd upon him. Indeed, I was somewhat startled, when I read it in a history that bears the name and character of Thuanus, tho' I thought he might possibly come at it by ministerial direction to an English resident, till at last I found his author to be no other than one of his own countrymen, whom Camden, as I have before observ'd, has refuted in other passages that are even more credible. Now these tell over this desperate story thus. In the month of June Sir Walter Raleigh, a man equally dexterous at consultation or action, says Thuanus, and famous for his memorable expeditions to the Indies, taking leave of his sister at London, intreated her to commend him to God in her prayers, for he was going to a place from whence he expected never to return. She, suspecting that he was going to fight a duel, with the same levity dispers'd it among the ladies of her acquaintance, till the rumour came to court. Then Raleigh's friends and relations flock'd about him to know this enterprize ; he, apprehending himself detected, readily made a whole confession and discovery of the matter. The king was inform'd, and greatly astonish'd, but would needs have Raleigh before him, who, then asking his pardon, acknowledged, that seeing his majesty give more countenance to the Scots than the English, and had depriv'd him of his command in the guards, and that many great men expected, when he was establish'd on the throne, he would be reveng'd for the death of his mother, he had therefore enter'd into a conspiracy with others, whom he named, to shed his royal blood ; and that they had unanimously deputed him to be his majesty's executioner, when he rode a hunting. Hereupon the said conspirators were taken up and try'd, as these authors proceed to relate. If there had been any truth in this ridiculous story, which I think no one has before taken the pains to relate in English, that confession had neither escap'd the attorney-general Coke at Raleigh's trial, when they were so lamely put to it to bring him in guilty without sufficient proof, nor king James's apologetical Declaration after Raleigh's death, in which his majesty, and his coun-

“ to discern, and has withal an honest and open heart, and loving truth ; if princes, or those who govern, endure no other discourse than their own flatteries ; then, I say, such a one, whose virtue and courage forbids him to be base, and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel ; which kind of deserving well, and receiving ill, we always falsely charge fortune withal : for whosoever shall tell any great man, or magistrate, that he is not just ; the general of an army, that he is not valiant ; and great ladies, that they are not fair ; shall never be made a counsellor, a captain, or a courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wife prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just ; for such a one has no estate in his prosperity ; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities ; sail with the tide of the time, and alter form and condition, as the state or states-master changes : otherwise, how were it possible that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course ?” A little further, having quoted out of Menander, “ That every fool is won with his own pride, and the flattering applause of others ;” he infers, “ That whosoever will live altogether out of himself, study other men's humours, and observe them shall never be unfortunate. On the contrary, that man, who prizes truth and virtue, except

“ the season wherein he lives be of these, and all sorts of goodness, fruitful, shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof.” So, after other learned authorities and proper examples, concludes with the following ingenious allusions, “ Whosoever therefore will set before him Machiavel's two marks to shoot at, riches and glory, must set on, and take off, a back of iron to a weak wooden bow, that he may fit both the strong and the feeble. For as he, who first devised to add sails to rowing vessels, did either so proportion them, as, being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his mast, he might abide all winds and storms, or else he some time or other perish'd by his own invention : so that man, who prizes virtue for itself, and cannot endure to hoist and strike sail, as the divers natures of calms and storms require, must cut his sails and his cloth of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure navigation ; to wit, a mean and free estate.” Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, lib. I. cap. 1. sect. 15.

cil together, have no less lamely offer'd weaker reasons for taking away his life, as will be fully represented in its proper place.

By our English accounts it appears there was somewhat of a plot, but it was never prov'd that Raleigh was engag'd in it; however, his great enemy, the attorney-general Coke, affected to compare him with the conspirators, "to Sampson's foxes, which were join'd in the tails, tho' their "heads were sever'd." What share he had in that plot may further be judg'd by the promotions which the conspirators intended themselves upon the success of it; for whereas one was to be lord chancellor, another lord marshal, this lord treasurer, that master of the horse, and t'other secretary of state: how comes it, as one author well observes, that Raleigh, able to officiate any, had no office in the state assign'd him? <sup>a</sup> But perhaps the best means to clear him, may be the very trial, by which he was condemn'd. 'Tis too common, and too tedious, to be thought needful of transcribing it here at length; not to say so full of barbarous partiality and foul language, especially by Coke himself, that he was expos'd for it upon the publick theatre; <sup>b</sup> and those, who revere the laws of our country, have been so ashamed of it, as rather to wish the proceedings have been falsely related, than believe such a sentence could pass upon such insufficient evidence. But the character of this trial, and of that attorney-general, I leave to others; <sup>c</sup> and shall here only, from the several copies or accounts of it I have met with, draw out a short regular narrative of the most material matters of fact, wherein Raleigh appears any way concern'd; and it is as follows:

THERE was one Matthew de Laurencie, a merchant of Antwerp, attendant on count Aremberg, who now, about the beginning of June, came over ambassador-extraordinary from Albert, archduke of Austria, to congratulate king James, and assist in composing the general peace. With this merchant the lord Cobham had held intelligence some years before, upon matters of state, with licence. Five days after Aremberg's arrival, that is to say, about the 9th of the same month, Cobham repair'd to him with Laurencie, and that night Cobham supp'd, with Sir Walter Raleigh, at Durham-house in the Strand; whereby Raleigh came to understand, that Cobham had fresh negotiations with Aremberg; and was, as the chief of those who oppos'd the peace, offer'd a sum of money by Cobham to be a promoter of it; tho' that offer, also made to Raleigh before Aremberg came, <sup>c</sup> was afterwards pretended, as will appear, to have been for treasonable purposes. In the next month, those persons with whom Cobham transacted the conspiracy (or part of it) then on foot, were discover'd; either by the Spanish faction in revenge to Raleigh, the greatest enemy of Spain alive, thinking he was then too far hamper'd in, or acquainted <sup>c</sup> The learned and ingenious author of the preface, to the collection of State-Trials in six volumes folio, having spoken of such counsel as are wont to press nothing illegal against the prisoner, or unreasonable, nor use any artifices to deprive him of his just defence, adds, "These will appear in a different light from those, who, with rude and boist'rous language, abuse and revile the unfortunate prisoner, who stick not to take all advantages of him, however hard and unjust, which either his ignorance, or the strict rigour of the law, may give them; who, by force or stratagem, endeavour to disable him from making his defence; who browbeat his witnesses as soon as they appear, tho' ever so willing to declare the whole truth; and do all they can to put them out of countenance, and confound them in delivering their evidence, as if it were the duty of their place to convict all who are brought to trial, right or wrong, guilty or not guilty; and as if they, above all others, had a peculiar dispensation from the obligations of truth and justice. Such methods as these should be below men of honour, not to say men of conscience; yet, in the perusal of this work, such persons will too often arise to view: and I could wish, for the credit of the law, that that great oracle of it, the lord chief justice Coke, had given less reason to be number'd among this sort." So, as a most notorious example, refers us to the trial of Sir Walter Raleigh.

Another author before this, having shewn us with what temper and superior command Sir Walter Raleigh behav'd himself under all the scurrilities which the attorney-general threw upon him, goes on thus. "We have given the reader a taste of the eloquence of the bar in that reign, to shew how far the hopes of places and preferment will sometimes carry men of sense and learning from reason and justice. This Billinggate way of arguing is the more remarkable in a person of the lord Coke's character, whose writings are still oracles in Westminster- hall; and scolding and calling of names were commonly the refuge of such wretched lawyers as were the tools of a party; who, having neither sense, law, nor language on their side, thought to supply the want of them with railing and impudence: which kind of baiting and worrying of state prisoners to death, by the king's counsel, was reviv'd by judge Jefferies in king Charles and king James II's reign; and it being much easier to call a man rogue, than to prove him so, the example he set was followed by too many, till the reverend bench of judges in the reign of king William and our present sovereign queen Anne, frown'd upon that cruel practice, and put an end to it." The Life of Sir Walter Raleigh in Lives English and Foreign. 8vo. 1704. vol. I. p. 124.

And before all this, even to Coke's own face, as much was objected, when he himself was humbled, and fallen into disgrace, by one of his own acquaintance, who told him, "As your pleadings were wont to insult over misery, and inveigh bitterly against the person, so are you still careless in this point, to praise and disgrace upon slight grounds, and that suddenly; so that your reproofs or commendations are for the most part neglected and condemn'd, when the censure of a judge, coming slow, but sure, should be a brand to the guilty, and a crown to the virtuous. You will jest at any man in publick, without respect to the person's dignity or your own. This disgraces your gravity, more than it can advance the opinion of your wit; and so do all actions which we see you do directly with a touch of vain-glory. You make the laws too much lean to your opinion; whereby you shew yourself to be a legal tyrant, &c." Thus in a letter admonitory to the lord Coke, MS. sign'd A. B. in a volume of State-Letters, among the curious collections of the lord Coleraine, fol. 772. This Letter is also printed in the Cabala, and an extract of it in Arthur Wilson's History of king James.

with it to escape; or by some one of the English conspirators to secure himself: and, when the lord Cecyll (for he was lately made baron of Essenden) found, upon the first news of Anthony Copley, one of these conspirators, who was apprehended the 6th of July,<sup>a</sup> that the king's person was to be surpriz'd by the lord Grey of Wilton, and George Brook, brother to the lord Cobham, he suspected Cobham himself was in the secret; and Cobham's great intimacy with Raleigh at this time, who was now buying an estate for him, and settling his household affairs, drew Raleigh also into suspicion. Hereupon Cecyll, meeting Raleigh upon Windsor terrace, tells him, "the lords of the council had something to say to him;" so he was examin'd about the surprizing treason, and particularly about Cobham, as appears from his own words, by whom he fully cleared. After examination, Raleigh further said: "Whatsoever correspondence there was between Cobham and Aremberg, Laurence might be better able to give account of it, therefore advis'd to the calling upon him;" tho', as he further explain'd, "he knew of no intelligence between them, but such as might be warranted:"<sup>b</sup> and that advice he wrote also in a letter to Cecyll. When Raleigh return'd from examination a private prisoner to his own house, Cobham sent to him to know what had pass'd; Raleigh writ an answer by captain Keymis, "that he was examin'd, and had clear'd him of all;" and Keymis bid Cobham "be of good comfort, for one witness could not condemn him:" this precaution, to arm Cobham against making discoveries, was, after his confession of it, objected against Raleigh; but he utterly deny'd, that he sent any such verbal message.<sup>c</sup> Now when Cobham was brought to his examination at Richmond, one date whereof appears to have been July 18; and after he had, by a constant denial, cleared both himself and Raleigh of all that was question'd against them, Cobham was, by device, says my author (in an epistolary narrative of his trial, at which he was present<sup>d</sup>) induced to think, that Raleigh had first impeach'd and betray'd him. For that part of Raleigh's letter aforesaid to Cecyll, referring the lords to Laurence for Cobham's transactions with Aremberg, being shewed to Cobham, and accompanied, it seems, with such artful suggestions as were proper to inflame a man of Cobham's weakness, had the desired effect; for he being led thereby to imagine that Raleigh had accus'd him of all, or more than he knew, burst out into vehement exclamations against Raleigh, and in his rage, or madness, made the following confession. "That having a passport to go to the Spanish king, he intended first to confer with the archduke; and, because he knew he had not money to pay his own army, meant from thence to go to Spain, to deal with the king for six hundred thousand crowns, then to return by Fersey; and that nothing should be done about the distribution of that money to the discontented in England, till he had spoken with Sir Walter Raleigh: Further, that he had never enter'd into these courses, but by his instigation. He spake also of plots, but of the particulars could give no account; yet acknowledg'd he was afraid that Raleigh, upon his return to Fersey, would have him and the money to the king."<sup>e</sup> After all this, before Cobham departed to the stair-foot, he retracted his confession, and profess'd he had done Raleigh wrong:<sup>f</sup> nor does it appear, says my author, that he did subscribe it.<sup>g</sup> In another branch of his examination, Cobham said he had of Raleigh a book, written against the king's title, which he gave to his brother Brook, and that Raleigh said it was foolishly written. But this he also retracted, as we shall hear. Upon this, and other parts of his confession more foreign to Raleigh, concerning the advancement of lady Arabella Stuart to the crown, as also from that of George Brook, a known enemy to Raleigh, as Cecyll could not deny; "asserting his brother Cobham told him (tho' Cobham, in his confession, refused to own it) the lord Grey and others were only on the bye, but he and Raleigh were on the main; thereby meaning, said Brook, the taking away of the king and his issue;" together with what Raleigh acknowledg'd in his own examination; "That Cobham offer'd him eight thousand crowns for his furtherance of the peace, tho' the lord Cecyll and earl of Northumberland were to have the same proffers;"<sup>h</sup> and that in some discourses he might have said, "the way to invade England was to begin with stirs in Scotland:" Upon these circumstances, I say, Raleigh was indicted at Stains on the 21st of September following;<sup>i</sup> and from hence that heavy indictment appears to have been accumulated upon him, which we see prefixed to his trial. Three days afterwards Cobham and Grey were also indicted at the same place; and, not long after this, they were all three return'd prisoners to the tower of London. When the time of their trial drew nigh, that is to say in the beginning of November, Raleigh got a poor fellow in the tower to cast up a letter, fasten'd to an apple, in at Cobham's window, while the lieutenant was at supper, to intreat him (because he then knew not but Cobham might be arraign'd before him :) "for God's sake, to do him justice by his answer, and signify to him, that he had wronged him in his accusation;" and Cobham did, by an answer under his hand, confess the same; which not being perhaps so full and expressive as Raleigh expected, he afterwards sent Cobham another letter, desiring he would publish his innocence at his arraignment. But, notwithstanding that Raleigh did not now request any further justification under his hand, Cobham sent him another answer,<sup>a</sup> clearing him in the most solemn and perfect manner, as will presently appear. Now by reason of the plague, which raged so violently in and about London, the term having been proclaim'd to be held at Winchester, the state-prisoners, who were thus indicted for the plot, were conveyed thither in great pomp. I find, that Raleigh went in his own coach, under the custody of Sir Robert Mansell, on the 10th of November, to Bagshot in Surrey, twenty-four miles from London; and, two days after, from thence, the other thirty miles, to the castle at Winchester. The conspirators conducted thither at the same time, were George Brook, under the charge of Sir William Wade; Sir Griffin Markham, under Sir Robert Wroth; besides Sir Edward Parham, Bartholomew Brooksby, Anthony Copley; also William Watson and William Clark, two priests, under-wardens of the Tower, and the keeper of the Gate-house, together with a guard of fifty light horse: as for Cobham and Grey, they set out six days, and arrived three days before, at the said castle, under the like guard.<sup>b</sup>

Winchester.

AND here Cobham having been prevail'd on to make fresh accusations in a letter to the lords, at least subscrib'd with his name, which will be produced a little further, Raleigh's trial was first brought on; and this was on the 17th of the month aforesaid. He excepted not against his Jury, being all strangers: but we are told by one, who seems to have had good intelligence of this matter, "That there was appointed for Raleigh another jury, the foreman of which was Sir Michael Stanhope, the next Sir Edward Darcy, the next Sir William Kille-
"grew, all men of honour, and near servants to the late queen Elizabeth: but these be"ing found not for their turn, they were all changed over night, and those others (named in "the common printed trial) put in their places."<sup>c</sup> After the indictment had been opened, and aggravated by serjeant Heath and attorney Coke, in speeches, manifestly fathering the treasons of the rest upon Raleigh, for no other reason that I can see, but because he was a man of wit, and a swordsman: Cobham's examination was read as before quoted. Here Raleigh first shewed the unreasonableness and improbability of the accusation therein against him, as follows:
"It is strange for me, said he, to devise with Cobham, that he should go to Spain to persuade "the king to disburse so much money, he being a man of no love in England; and I
"having resign'd my room of chiefest command, the wardenship of the Stannaries; it is strange
"for me to make myself a Robin Hood, or a Ket, or a Cade, I knowing England to be in "better state than ever it was. I knew Scotland united, Ireland quieted, Denmark assur'd, "which before was suspected. I knew, that having a lady, whom time had surpriz'd, we "had now a lawful successor. The state of Spain was not unknown to me. I had written a "discourse, which I intended to present unto the king against the peace with Spain. I knew
"the Spaniard had six repulses, three in Ireland, and three at sea; and once in 1588, by my "lord-admiral, also at Cadiz. I knew he was discourag'd and dishonour'd. I knew the king "of Spain to be the proudest prince living, but now he comes creeping to my master for a "peace. I knew, whereas he had before in his ports six or seven score sail of ships, he has "now but six or seven. I knew, of twenty-five millions he had from his Indies, he has scarce
"one left. I knew him so poor, that the Jesuits in Spain were fain to beg at the church-door.
"Was it ever read or heard, that any prince should disburse so much money, without a suf"ficient pawn? I knew her own subjects, the citizens of London, would not lend her majesty "money, without lands in mortgage. I knew the queen did not lend the states money, with"out Flushing, Brill, and other towns, for a pawn; and can it be thought he would let Cobham
"have so great a sum? I never came to the lord Cobham's, but about matters of his profit,
"as the ordering of his house; and I had of his, when I was examin'd, four thousand pounds
"worth of jewels for a purchase, a pearl of three thousand pounds, and a ring worth five “ hundred pounds. If he had had a fancy to run away, he would not have left so much money to have purchas’d a lease in fee-farm. I saw him buy three hundred pounds worth of books to send to his library at Canterbury, and a cabinet of three hundred pounds to give Mr. Attorney for drawing the conveyances; and God in heaven knows, not I, whether he intended to travel: but for the practice with Arabella, or letters to Aremberg, or any discourse with him, or in what language he spake unto him; if I knew any of these things, I would absolutely confess the indictment, and acknowledge myself worthy of a thousand deaths.” And a little further concerning Cobham’s examination: “ He that hath been examin’d, has ever been asked if it be according to his meaning, and then to subscribe. Methinks, my lords, when he accuses a man, he should give some account and reason of it; it is not sufficient to say we talked of it. If I had been the plotter, would not I have given Cobham some arguments, whereby to persuade the king of Spain, and answer his objections? I knew Westmoreland and Bothwell, men of other understandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their bread.”<sup>a</sup> Here being obstructed by other matters, the attorney fell at last into that passage of Cobham’s telling Brook, “ You are on the bye, Raleigh and I are on the main.” But Cobham would not confirm his ever having said such words.<sup>b</sup> Brook, who had pretended he did say them, was allowed to have been Raleigh’s enemy;<sup>c</sup> so the expression was not proved. Another matter they kept some coil about was, the book Cobham said he had of Raleigh, written against the king’s title. This was nothing more than a Defence of the queen’s Proceedings against Mary queen of Scotland, written by one Robert Snag, a lawyer, and found by Raleigh in the library of the late lord-treasurer Burghley, which he had liberty of searching for some geographical descriptions of the West-Indies. Raleigh had declared to Cobham that it was foolishly written, but deny’d that he gave it him; and tho’ Cobham, in his examination, said it was given him by Raleigh, he revoked that confession upon being further question’d about it (as one of the lords of the council own’d;) and said, the truth was, “ he took the same of himself out of Sir Walter Raleigh’s study when he was asleep;”<sup>d</sup> so much to be depended on were lord Cobham’s accusations. But there was nothing acted thereby to the king’s prejudice, for the book was burnt.<sup>e</sup> As for the evidence of a rumour in Lisbon, brought into court by one Dyer, a pilot, who answering to a question, “ when the king would be crown’d?” made by some-body or other there, that “ he hop’d ’twould be shortly;” was told again, “ it should never be, for Don Raleigh and Don Cobham would cut his throat first:” Raleigh made light of it, as of such a rumour and such a witness he might; and said, “ If Cobham had practice with Aremberg, it might well be known abroad: and that the duke of Buckingham was named with Jack Straw’s treason to countenance it.”<sup>f</sup> But none of these little circumstances were much insisted on; and we are told by one who was present, that, “ touching the setting up of Arabella, nothing at all was proved; nor touching the invasion here, or sedition in Scotland, or even the destruction of the king, &c. The proof against Raleigh (as the same writer continues a little further) did rest only upon Cobham’s accusation, and some presumptions, whereof that only was the ground: therefore Raleigh spent most of the time in disabling that accusation, as being only utter’d in fury and passion,”<sup>g</sup> through the device aforesaid, of making Cobham believe that Raleigh had first accused him. Besides, that he had renounced and repented it; and altho’, “ afterwards by practice, says my said author, he did affirm it, yet would he never be brought to set his hand to the examination: all which was clear.” Then Raleigh, seeing this retraction so unjustly overlook’d, “ labour’d to prove these two points out of scripture, civil law, statute law, common law and conscience; in every of which he had been plentifully read (as the same auditor of his arraignment goes on:) first, that there ought to be produced against him two witnesses: secondly, that his accuser might be brought to accuse him face to face.” Agreeable hereto are Raleigh’s own words, after he had urged the statutes of Edward III, Edward VI, and queen Elizabeth; produced the opinions of judges in the law, and precedents from their writings; besides testimonies from the Old and New Testament; where he says, “ If by the statute, civil law, and God’s word, it be requir’d that there must be two witnesses at least, bear with me, if I desire but one.”<sup>h</sup> But truly it was an unreasonable request; those statutes were repeal’d, and the law would not allow of it now; tho’ we are inform’d that king James himself, taking notice how Cobham was with-held, should say, “ If he could “ have spoken any thing against Raleigh, they would have brought him from Constantinople

 “ to have accused him.”<sup>a</sup> Well therefore might he desire the jury to consider, “ There is no cause
 “ so doubtful, which the king’s counsel cannot make good against the law.”<sup>b</sup> These men do “ usually defend bad causes every day against men of their own profession, and as able as “ themselves : if they can do so, what may they not do with me, who never studied law till “ I came into the tower of London ; who have been practis’d in other affairs ; am weak of “ memory, and feeble as you see ? (for he was fain to have a pen and ink to help him in the “ long speeches that were made against him.”) Then said he, more closely to them, “ If “ you would be content to be judg’d upon Suspitions and Inferences : if you would not have “ your accusation subscrib’d by your accuser : if you would not have your accuser brought to “ your face (being in the same house too) where you are arraign’d : if you would be con“ demn’d by an accusation of one that has recanted, and is truly sorrowful for it : if you,
 “ in my case, would yield your bodies to torture, lose your lives, your wives and children, “ and all your fortunes, upon so slender a proof ; then am I ready to suffer all these things :”<sup>c</sup> or (as the common trial has it) “ If you would be contented to be so judged, judge so of “ me.”<sup>d</sup> Now tho’ Raleigh at last put himself on it, that if Cobham would only speak before God and the king, “ that ever he knew either of Arabella’s matter, or the money out of Spain, “ or of the surprizing treason, or would accuse him with things equivalent, in any main point, “ or any ways to have been an instigator of him to deal with the king of Spain ;”<sup>e</sup> yet would they not let Cobham confront him, or give his testimony viva voce : and tho’ Raleigh did not directly consent to be determin’d by Cobham’s accusation, if they should now produce it justified under his hand ;<sup>f</sup> yet he was forced to submit to what they had in reserve of this kind, which was the letter above-mention’d, written to the lords at Winchester the day before the trial. Some say, this letter was not written by Cobham himself ; but that Sir William Wade, one of Cecyll’s creatures, tampering with his weakness, got Cobham to write his name to a blank ; to which, says my author, Wade no question wrote the accusation.<sup>g</sup> Others imply, that Cobham did himself write it ; tho’ after he was instructed by a letter from his lady, that there was no way to save his own life, but to accuse Raleigh ; and that it was so reported upon the going together of the jury.<sup>h</sup> This letter was read with great triumph and exultation by Coke, as follows. “ I have thought it fit to set down this to my lords, wherein I profess on “ my soul to write nothing but the truth. I am come now near to the period of my time ;
 “ therefore I confess the truth before God and his angels. Raleigh, four days before I came “ from the Tower, caused an apple to be thrown in at my chamber window ; the effect of it “ was, to intreat me to right the wrong I had done him, in saying that I would come home “ by Jersey ; which under my hand to him I have retracted. His first letter was thrown in “ the same manner ; wherein he prayed me to write him a letter, which I did. He sent me “ word the judges met at Mr. Attorney’s house ; and that there was good hope the proceed“ ings against us should be staid ; he sent me another time a little tobacco. At Aremberg’s “ coming, Raleigh dealt with me to procure him a pension of fifteen hundred pounds a year,
 “ for which he promised, that no action should be against Spain but he would give knowledge “ before-hand. He told me the states had audience with the king. He hath been the origi“ nal cause of my ruin ; for I had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his instigation. He hath “ been the cause of my discontentment ; he advised me not to be overtaken with preachers,
 “ as Effex was ; and that the king would better allow of a constant denial, than to accuse any.”<sup>i</sup>
 But this advice to a denial, and by that example, and the desire of any such pension from Spain,
Raleigh protested to be false. And further, to shew them what a base dishonourable recreant
Cobham was, he pull’d out the letter which Cobham a few days before wrote to him voluntarily in the Tower, desiring the lord Cecyll to read it, because he knew his hand ; and that the jury would observe, if Cobham’s testimony were of any credit with them, how much more solemnly it was writ to clear, than the other to condemn him ; being in these words : “ Seeing myself “ so near my end ; for the discharge of my own conscience, and freeing myself from your “ blood, which else will cry vengeance against me : I protest, upon my salvation, I never “ practis’d with Spain by your procurement : God so comfort me in this my affliction, as you are

“ a true subject for any thing that I know. I will say with Daniel, Purus sum à sanguine hujus :
 “ So God have mercy on my soul, as I know no treason by you.”<sup>a</sup> This was the last evidence given ; yet the jury brought in their verdict guilty : this letter, last produced to acquit Ra- Condemn'd.
legb, not prevailing with them so much, it seems, as the letter before, which was last, tho’ less forcibly, written by Cobham to accuse him, “ which, all things consider’d, says the “ person, who heard the whole trial, was no more to be weigh’d than the barking of a dog ; and “ I would not (continues he) for much, to have been of the jury, to have found him guilty.”<sup>b</sup>
 “ Some of his jury, we are further told, were, after he was cast, so far touch’d in conscience, “ as to demand of him pardon on their knees ;”<sup>c</sup> and even Coke, the attorney himself, being “ retir’d into a garden to take some air, when his man brought him word that the jury had “ condemn’d Ralegh of treason, answer’d, Surely thou art mistaken, for I myself accused “ him but of misprision of treason ; and this relation, upon the word of a Christian, I have “ received, says my author, from Sir Edward Coke’s own mouth.”<sup>d</sup> Sentence being given, Ralegh humbly desir’d, the king might know the proofs against him ; that he still persisted in his loyalty, notwithstanding that verdict ; which he would pray, that his said jury might never answer for : and only craved pardon for concealing lord Cobham’s offer to him, which he did through a confidence that he had diverted him from those humours. So accompanied the sheriff to the prison “ with admirable erection, yet in such sort as a condemn’d man should “ do.”<sup>e</sup>

THUS was he “ tired out of his life, as one observes, by the bawling of the king’s counsel
 “ on one side, and the bench’s insisting on a confession, extorted from the lord Cobham out “ of fear, on the other, rather than convinced :”<sup>f</sup> and thus did his adversaries reap dishonour and reproach in their victory, while he received triumphant applauses in his overthrow, like some flowers which are sweeter in their fall, than others in their bloom. He stood at a bay with them from morning till night, “ to the great admiration of the hearers,<sup>g</sup> who all thought “ that a man of such understanding and experience, would hardly be drawn into a plot so “ foul and so foolish.”<sup>h</sup> “ Divers, who went thither his enemies, went away with commise“ ration of his injuries and misfortunes, thinking never man spake better for himself.”<sup>i</sup> One of his auditors says, “ He behaved himself so worthily, so wisely, so temperately, that in half “ a day the mind of all the company was changed, from the extremest hate, to the extremest “ pity.”<sup>k</sup> and another says, That “ Sir Walter Ralegh’s carriage was most remarkable ;
 “ first, to the lords ; humble, yet not prostrate : towards the jury ; affable, but not fawning ; “ rather shewing love of life, than fear of death : towards the king’s counsel ; patient, but “ not insensibly neglecting ; not yielding to imputations laid against him in words : and it was “ wonder’d, that a man of his heroic spirit, could be so valiant in suffering ; that he was “ never overtaken in passion, &c.”<sup>l</sup> On the other side, as to Coke’s behaviour, we shall, to what has been said, only observe, as one means to account for it, that if Essex was known to have ever been in any wise a friend or patron to him, as it appears he was in a private memorial of an honourable person, who was of the same college in Oxford with Ralegh, and almost of the same standing ; then Coke might perhaps think of retrieving himself in the eye of the world, and making atonement for his ingratitude to the said earl, also at his trial, and to his memory after his death, by his inhumanity now to one of the contrary faction. Cecyll, on the other side, play’d a smooth edge upon Ralegh throughout the trial ; his blade seemed ever anointed with the balsam of compliment or apology, whereby he gave not such rough and smarting wounds, tho’ they were as deep and fatal as the other. But Ralegh could distinguish crooked friendship, and perhaps the grounds of it, in this place, as well as he has done crooked wisdom in another ;<sup>m</sup> when, to those speeches, where Cecyll said, “ My affection, “ to you Sir Walter Ralegh was not extinguish’d, but flaked, in regard of your deserts :
 “ and, excepting your faults (I call them no worse) by God I am your friend :” he answer’d, “ Whoever is the workman, it is reason he should give account of his work to the work-“ master.”<sup>n</sup> As to any impertinences that occur’d in the trial, they appear no-where so much as in the personal reflections made by the said attorney Coke, and the lord chief justice

Popham, whom Camden justly calls a censorious man;<sup>a</sup> they being foreign to the matters Raleigh was charged with, therefore he wisely looked over them. But these, and the other irregularities throughout the whole proceedings, which have left men so unsatisfied in the justice of them against Sir Walter Raleigh, and so little inclin'd to believe him the criminal his enemies made him,<sup>b</sup> being summ'd up by an able hand, and one whose province it more properly was to judge of them, I shall take my leave of the said trial, with a reference to his observations on it.<sup>c</sup>

THAT Raleigh expected nothing less than this kind of treatment from those hands, is plain by the letter which he wrote to the king himself just before his trial; wherein having said, "I know, that, among many presumptions gather'd against me, your majesty has been persuaded, that I was one of those who were greatly discontented, and therefore the more likely to prove disloyal; but the great God of heaven and earth disclaim me from both worlds if I were not the contrary, and if I took not great comfort to behold your majesty; always learning some good, and bettering my knowledge by your majesty's discourse: and having humbly beseeched him not to believe any of those, who, under pretence of offences to kings, do easily work their particular revenge;" he says a little further, "For my part, I protest before the ever-living God, that I never intended treason, consented to treason, or perform'd treason against you; and yet I know I shall fall into their hands, e quibus non possum evadere, unless by your majesty's gracious compassion I be sustain'd."<sup>d</sup> Another letter, which he wrote to the lords, gives us some further light or assurance, that the offer made to him for one intention, and to others for another, was construed as made to him for both; where, speaking of the two principal accusations against him, he says, "the first was, that money was offer'd me with a pretence to maintain the amity, but the intent was to have assisted his majesty's surprize: the other, that I was privy to my lord Cobham's Spanish journey. For the first, it seems, this money was offer'd to others long after it was offer'd to me, and upon other considerations than it was to me. For myself I avow, upon my allegiance, that I never knew or suspected either the man or the new intention. To me it was but once propounded, and in three weeks after I never heard more of it; neither did I believe that he had any commission to offer it: for, if that word amity had been used to me colourably, I must have been also made acquainted with the true end for which it should have been given; which it seems was for the surprize: but of any such horrible purpose, if ever I had so much as a suspicion, I refuse your lordships favour, and the king's mercy. I know your lordships have omitted nothing to find out the truth; but, as you have not err'd, like ill surgeons, to lay on plaisters too narrow for so great wounds, so I trust that you will not imitate unlearned physicians, to give medicines more cruel than the disease itself. For the journey into Spain, I know I was accused to be privy thereto; but I know your lordships have a reputation of conscience, as well as industry. By what means that revengeful accusation was stirr'd, you, my lord Cecyll, know right well, that it was my letter about Keymis; and your lordships all know whether it be maintain'd, or whether, out of truth, and out of a Christian consideration, it be revok'd." A little further he says, "God knows, and I can give an account of it, that I have spent forty thousand pounds of <sup>c</sup> Sir John Hawles, solicitor-general to the late king William, in his Reply to a sheet of paper, entitled, The Magistracy and Government of England vindicated; printed in 1689 having observed, that the accusations of Sir Walter Raleigh did not amount to a legal proof; says further, p. 35, as follows. "Not to mention all that might be excepted to in the trial of the case cited; I would know, by what law is the deposition of a person, who might be brought face to face to the prisoner, read as evidence? I would know, by what law it is forbidden, that the accuser should be brought face to face to the accused? I would know, by what law Brook's deposition of what the lord Cobham told him of Raleigh, was evidence against Raleigh? I would know, by what law the story Dyer told of what an unknown man said to him at Talbot of Don Raleigh, was evidence against Raleigh? I would know, by what statute, the statutes of the 25th of Edward III. and 5th of Edward VI. are repealed? This trial was so very irregular throughout, that I would willingly believe it was not so as it is related; but, if it were so, I am sure none can defend it: and even for that reason, if any such resolution was in the case, as is cited, I am sure it ought to carry no credit with it: and there is no reason to believe there was any such resolution; there being no occasion for it;

"the question being only fact, which Sir Walter deny'd. The circumstances of his trial, in which the court always over-rul'd the prisoner, were somewhat like the lord Ruffel's; he complained of the ill usage of the king's counsel, as well as the lord Ruffel; and both had reason so to do. Hearsay was admitted to be given in evidence against both; all that either of them said for themselves, tho' very material, was slighted. The one was put in mind, at his trial, of the death of the earl of Essex; as the other was, of the death of the viscount Stafford; both, in their dying speeches, vindicated themselves of those aspersions. The principal witnesses, in both cases, had, before the trials, affirm'd, they knew nothing against them: they were both accused with having heard what other persons had said in their company, and had not discover'd it; they both gave the same answer, that they could not help other men's talk. I think it is plain, at this day, that of Sir Walter Raleigh is thought a Sham-plot; what the lord Ruffel's is thought, let the author say."

“ my own against that king and nation ;<sup>a</sup> that I never reserved so much of all my fortunes,
 “ as to purchase forty pounds per annum land ; that I have been a violent persecutor and fur“ therer of all enterprizes against that nation : I have served against them in person ; and how,
 “ my lord-admiral and my lord of Suffolk can witness. I discover’d, myself, the richest part “ of all his Indies ; I have planted in his territories. I offer’d his majesty, at my uncle Ca- “ rew’s, to carry two thousand men to invade him without the king’s charge. Alas ! to what “ end should we live in the world, if all the endeavours of so many testimonies shall be blown “ off with one blast of breath, or be presented by one man’s word ?” “ Think therefore (says
 “ he a little further) I beseech you, on my great affliction with compassion ; who have lost
 “ my estate, and the king’s favour, upon one man’s word ; and as you would that God should “ deal with you, deal with me.” He concludes in this manner : “ Your lordships know, “ that I am guiltless of the surprize intended ; you know, or may know, that I never accept“ ed of the money, and that it was not offered me for any ill ; and of the Spanish journey, “ I trust your consciences are resolved. Keep not then, I beseech you, these my answers and “ humble desires from my sovereign lord, qui est rex pius et misericors, et non leo coronatus.”<sup>b</sup> In another letter which he wrote to the king after his trial, he has these words : “ Lost I am for “ hearing a vain man, for hearing only, and never believing or approving ; and so little “ account I made of that speech of his, which was my condemnation, that I never remember’d “ any such thing, till it was at my trial objected against me.” This letter he nobly concludes, with a desire only to repay a lent life with a love and affection equal to the goodness wherewith his majesty should please to bestow it.<sup>c</sup>

IF these letters had any good effect, it appeared not immediately, Raleigh being kept near a month at Winchester after he was condemn’d, in daily expectation of death. We find, that when the report of the arraignments was made to the king in his privy-chamber at Wilton, he carried himself so reservedly, that no-body could guess how well he was satisfied with the equality of condemnation, till he made, himself, a difference in the punishment. The two priests were executed on the 29th of November, and George Brook on the 5th of December following.
 His majesty also sign’d warrants for Cobham, Grey and Markham, to be beheaded on the 9th day of the said month. But, in the particular narrative of this proceeding to execution, ‘Ra- leigh is not so much as mention’d ; and this might be owing to the extraordinary disappointment of that purgation, which was expected from one of those three next to be executed : for the day aforesaid being come, Markham was first brought to the scaffold ; and, having ended his speech, prayers, with all he had to say, and being on his knees, ready to receive the stroke of the ax ; up steps John Gibb, groom of the king’s bed-chamber, to Sir Benjamin Tichbourne, the sheriff of Hampshire, with his majesty’s warrant to stay the execution ; so Markham was told he must withdraw a while into the hall, to be confronted by the lords. Then lord Grey was brought upon the stage ; and he is said to have poured out his prayers and his confession, tho’ not one word of them recorded in our narrative aforesaid ; then was he also call’d aside.
 Lastly, Cobham was brought, and expos’d in the same manner ; and his devotions to God are mention’d ; but not a word of the treason, his guilt or innocence, or concerning any promoter of his disloyalty or discontent : so when he had done, the sheriff found it time to unravel the plot, by proclaiming and magnifying his majesty’s mercy, as we have it in the same author ; who yet cannot forbear comparing his own relation to a comedy, “ representing so “ many lively figures of justice and mercy in a king, of terror and penitence in offenders, “ and of so great admiration and applause in all others as appear’d in this action, carried on “ only and wholly by his majesty’s own direction.”<sup>d</sup> But whereas Coke had (after his outragious manner) charged Raleigh in the trial frequently with being the chief plotter and traitor in all this conspiracy : we now see the king, in his warrant aforesaid, contradicting him, where he says, to use his own dialect, that, “ the two priestis, and George Brooke, vaire the principall “ plotteris and intifairs of all the rest, to the embracing of the saidis treasonabill machina“ tions :”<sup>e</sup> and yet you find, in the trial again, that Brook’s treason was distinct, and to be

 ments, grounded on presumptions, to prove him guilty ; so did he there also use others to clear himself, grounded on these of his great expences against the Spaniards, and his having always been such a noted enemy to their faction.
 But the sum of 40,000 l. in this letter above, is only call’d so many crowns in the said common trial.

kept secret from Raleigh, because there Brook tells Markham “ take heed how you make “ lord Cobham acquainted ; for, whatever he knows, Raleigh the witch will get it out of “ him.”<sup>a</sup> In short, the whole proceeding is so full of inconsistencies, flanders, and other like odious effects of a false and malicious prosecution, that we may well conclude with that historian, who says, “ the king had ground enough to shew mercy, which some of the condemn’d “ party obtain’d.”<sup>b</sup>

BUT Raleigh, it seems, did last taste of it, and for no other apparent reason, but because he was the only one whom his enemies still wanted matter to exclude from it ; as may be gather’d from what Cecyll wrote to a correspondent three days after the king’s warrant of suspension, to the others before-mention’d ; where, among these wonderful instances of his majesty’s clemency, we are told, “ He pretended to forbear Sir Walter Raleigh for the present, “ till the lord Cobham’s death had given some light how far he would make good his accusation : ”<sup>c</sup> and tho’ we hear not that he ever did make it good, yet was the pretended time of Raleigh’s execution so determin’d, however we find not, that he, like the rest, was ever brought to the place ; that he wrote, what he intended for his last words, to his wife, the night before he expected to be put to death, in a very moving letter, full of the most generous acknowledgments, of the wisest, most religious and affectionate advice to her, no less than of the most heroic and magnanimous sentiments in regard to himself, and to that suffering which ordinary souls so naturally shrink at. It is too long to recite in this place, besides has been often printed, and may be easily met with in his works. The historical passages in it acquaint us, that his lands were conveyed to his son, as is before-mention’d : that he intended his wife the profits of his wine-office, half his goods, and all his jewels, except some one to his son : that Baily owed him two hundred, or, as other editions have it, a thousand pounds ;<sup>d</sup> and his brother Adrian Gilbert six hundred : that he had also much money owing him in Jersey, besides the arrearages of the wines, which would pay all his debts. Towards the conclusion, he intreats her “ to get those letters, if it be possible, which I writ, said he, to the lords, where- “ in I sued for my life. God is my witness, that it was for you and yours that I desir’d “ life. But it is true that I disdain myself for begging it ; for know it, dear wife, that “ your son is the son of a true man, and one, who, in his own respect, despises death, and “ all his mishapen and ugly forms. I cannot write much ; God knows how hardly I steal “ this time, while others sleep ; and it is also high time, that I should separate my “ thoughts from the world. Beg my dead body, which living was deny’d thee, and either “ lay it at Sherborne, if the land continue, or in Exeter church, by my father and mother. “ I can say no more ; time and death call me away.” And as, in the former part of this letter “ he trusts that his blood will quench their malice, who had thus cruelly murder’d him : ” so in the conclusion, “ he prays to God, that he may forgive his persecutors and accusers.”<sup>e</sup>

the Tower of London.

BUT after all this usage, Cobham never confirming his accusation of Sir Walter Raleigh, they both were, with the rest of the prisoners, returned, on the 15th of December, to the Tower of London :<sup>f</sup> those, of whom the least profit was to be made, were either acquitted, or did afterwards get their liberty ; among whom was Markham, who travell’d abroad, but endured greater distress in his state of freedom, than he had in his restraint.<sup>g</sup> But Grey, it seems, died in the Tower,<sup>h</sup> and with Cobham it went nigh to fare still worse ; for he would have starved there, being so closely fleec’d as he was by the court-beggars of his great estate, had they not also laid thereby a kind of a fine upon his majesty for his offences ; the crown being imposed upon to support him in his many years confinement, as Raleigh himself has sufficiently discover’d.<sup>i</sup> And here, to dispatch what more remains of this lord relating to our present

<sup>i</sup> The lord Cecyll, who was created earl of Salisbury in 1605, and lord-treasurer, upon the death of Buckburgh, earl of Dorset, in 1608, did very much engross the revenues of the crown, as Raleigh made appear to the king himself, in an excellent Dialogue he dedicated to his majesty ; where, among the particulars, of Cecyll’s neglecting an increase of 40,000 pounds to the king’s estate, the conferring a 10,000 l. fine upon Devonshire and his mistress, the engrossing to himself many goodly manors, and the exchange of Theobald’s for Hatfield, which the greatest subject or favourite queen Elizabeth had, never present history, we may observe, that some years after their confinement, Raleigh is said to have himself procur'd a re-examination of Cobham, and to have been absolutely cleared by him. But the practices which were used against him therein, are represented so foul and wicked, as to have given some, whose interest it was to favour the administrations of these times, occasion to suspect the assertion; tho' it is corroborated by several material circumstances, as well as the testimony of coeval writers. The author, in whom we first meet with this passage, and whose shorter account of it is before related, to shew that Raleigh's life was surreptitiously taken away, gives it us again more circumstantially, and as a true story, thus, "Queen Anne, that brave princess, was in a desperate, and some believed incurable disease, whereof the physicians were at the furthest end of their studies to find the cause, at a non plus for the cure. Sir Walter Raleigh being, by his long studies, an admirable chymist, <sup>a</sup> undertook His cure of queen Anne. and perform'd the cure; <sup>b</sup> for which he would receive no other reward, but that her majesty would procure, that certain lords might be sent to examine Cobham, whether he had accused Sir Walter Raleigh of treason at any time under his hand? the king, at the queen's request (and in justice could do no less) sends some lords and others of the council (which, as our author goes on, were the duke of Lenox, Salisbury, Worcester, Suffolk, Sir George Carew, and Sir Julius Caesar) to demand of Cobham; whether he had not, under his hand, accused Sir Walter Raleigh at Winchester, upon that treason he was arraign'd for? Cobham did protest, never, nor could he; <sup>c</sup> but, said he, that villain Wade did often sollicite me, and, not prevailing that way, got me, by a trick, to write my name upon a piece of white paper, which I, thinking nothing, did; so that, if any charge came under my hand, it was forged by that villain Wade, by writing something above my hand, without my consent or knowledge. <sup>d</sup> These six returning to the king, the rest made Salisbury their spokesman; who said: Sir, My lord Cobham hath made good all that ever he wrote or said. Where it is to be noted, that this was but an equivocating trick in Salisbury; for it was true, that Cobham had made good whatever he had writ, but never wrote any thing to accuse Raleigh; by which you see the baseness of this lord, the credulity of the king, and the ruin of Sir Walter Raleigh." <sup>e</sup> As for the miserable end this lord Cobham made, the same author relates it; <sup>f</sup> and it is also confirm'd by others, who were well acquainted with the history of these times, and durst have named to her; he farther instances, that, "It had been an honest service to the king, to have also added 7000 l. lands of the lord Cobham's, with his woods and goods, worth 30,000 l. more. For those lands, remaining with George Brook's children but during their lives, had been the king's for ever in effect; but to wrest them from the king, and draw the inheritance upon himself, the treasurer persuaded his majesty to relinquish his interest for a petty sum of money; and, that there might be no counter-working, he sent Brook six thousand pounds to make friends; whereof lord Hume had two thousand pounds back again, Buckhurst and Berwick had the other four thousand pounds, and the treasurer and his heirs the mass of land for ever." What then came to the king by this confiscation? (says one of the correspondents in the said Dialogue.) "His majesty (answers t'other) by all those goodly possessions, woods and goods, loses five hundred pounds a year, which he gives in pension to Cobham to maintain him in prison." See Sir Walter Raleigh's Prerogative of Parliaments in his Remains (last edit) p. 249, &c.

<sup>a</sup> The author here quoted, seems to have been well acquainted with Sir Walter Raleigh's character, by this circumstance; for there is still in being a volume of Chymical and Medicinal Preparations, in Raleigh's own hand-writing, as will more particularly be observ'd a few pages farther.

<sup>b</sup> The author of Aulicus Coquinarius thinks, he sufficiently answers this passage; where he says, p. 97, "the queen was never cur'd of her disease, but by death, that ends all maladies." Now the disease, which this queen Anne died of, was a dropsy, but not till after Sir Walter Raleigh's death, and above fifteen year after this imprisonment; whereas the disease, from which Raleigh recover'd her, was a fever, as Dr. Wekwood informs us in his Narrative on Wilton's History of King James. In the same place he says, it was some time before the illness of Anne; and Camden, in his Annals of King James, telling us, when Sir Julius Caesar was made a peer, could not, we may conclude this cure was perform'd between the years 1607 and 1612.

serves, "that Raleigh and Cobham being prisoners, upon the suit of queen Anne (who was thereunto press'd by Sir Walter Raleigh) Cobham was re-examin'd before some of the lords of the council at the Tower, and did clear Sir Walter Raleigh from all treasons whatsoever." Observations upon some persons and passages in the Complaint History of Mary queen of Scotland, and her son James, 4to. 1656, p. 12.

<sup>f</sup> He tells us, that, "as lord Grey died pitied, Cobham died scorn'd, and his death as base; for he died louty for want of apparel and linen; and had starv'd, had not a trencher-scraper, some time his servant in court, relieved him with scraps, in whose house he died, being so poor a house, as he was forced to creep up a ladder into a little hole to his chamber; which was a strange judgment, and unprecedented for a man of seven thousand pounds per annum, and of a personal estate of thirty thousand pounds; of all which the king was so cheated (or of what should have cheated to him) that he could not give him any maintenance, as in all cases the king does, unless out of his own revenue of the crown; which was the occasion of this lord's want (his wife being very rich, and would not give him the crumbs that fell from her table) and this was a just judgment of God on him." The Works, p. 37, &c. Observations, much to the same tenor, tell us, from the authority of William earl of Portland, "that and from whom we learn, that Cobham survived not Sir Walter Raleigh above two or three months.<sup>a</sup>

BUT to return to more early passages in Raleigh's imprisonment, and to consider his state, as it appears at his entrance therein, we may very easily believe, he was at first in very great trouble to be so suddenly, and in such a manner, depriv'd of power, fortune, liberty and reputation; but find nothing to confirm the extraordinary dejection one writer, who has been before spoken of, describes him under; where he says, "In the publick joy and jubilee of the whole realm, when favour, peace and pardon were offer'd even to offenders; he, who in wit, in wealth, in courage, was inferior to few, fell suddenly (he cannot tell how) into such a downfall of despair, that his greatest enemies would not have wished him so much harm, as he would have done himself;"<sup>b</sup> for we have seen he had enemies, who would have done him the injury that could not be exceeded, had not the king, in some degree of justice, rather than mercy to him, interpos'd, and secured him, as well from being quite destroyed by, as taking revenge on them: besides, that letter to his wife before-mention'd, when his fate appeared nearest and most unavoidable to him, demonstrates the firmness and fortitude of a man, who could receive death as an acquaintance, rather than a stranger, or one, who, having so often gone to face him among the foes to his country abroad, could, with equal steadiness and composure of mind, meet him from those at home. Indeed, the affairs of a person, who had such various and extensive dealings or commerce with mankind, could not but be somewhat perplex'd and embarrass'd, upon a fall so sudden and precipitous; therefore, to find him employing agents for collecting in debts, and satisfying creditors, is to be expected. Thus, in one of his letters to Sir Michael Hext, he desires him to spare John Shellbury for a little time, he being bound for him in a sum of fifteen hundred pounds; and, if he was restrained, so that he could not recover the wine-arrearages, which (as we find from Raleigh's letter before to his wife) would clear all his debts, they must remain unpaid. The date endors'd upon this letter, probably by Sir Michael himself, is November 12, 1604.<sup>c</sup> In the middle of February following, we find a grant made by the king, to that John Shellbury and another person, to this effect: "That Sir Walter Raleigh, late of Sherborne, &c. being attainted of high treason, whereby all his goods and chattels, real and personal, moveable and immoveable; debts, duties, sums of money, bonds, &c. are forfeited. His majesty therefore, in consideration that the said debts, which Sir Walter Raleigh did truly owe before the said attainder and conviction, may be justly and truly paid; as also for the help and maintenance of dame Elizabeth his wife, his child and family; and for other considerations, grants to John Shellbury and Robert Smith of London, gentlemen, all the said goods, &c."

THUS we see a great distinction made already between him and Cobham, and shall find more favour extending towards him in a little while. 'Tis said to be much owing to the earnest and unwearied intercessions of his lady at court, who, that she might be more serviceable to him, soon after he was committed to the Tower, petition'd the king, that she might be a prisoner with her husband, or live with him there in his confinement; and her request was granted. Here, manifestly after the grant aforesaid to Raleigh's trustees, because that mentions but one of his sons, she was deliver'd of the other, and he was christen'd Carew, who was yet born, as authors compute, within the year above-mention'd. To this satisfaction, Raleigh had others afterwards, which greatly alleviated the loss of his liberty; so that his restraint, which was intended as a mortification, his prudence in time so converted, that it proved only a retirement, or the quiet enjoyment of a domestick life; and he felt certain comforts arise from the constant company of his little family, which, in the pomp of courts, the pride of conquests, the glory of discoveries, and the sweetness of freedom itself, he had never tasted. But this tranquillity appears not to have suddenly arriv'd, being for a while divested of all his estate; and, having some contentions at law with those who were considerably indebted to him, and could not otherwise be brought to account; one instance whereof we have in Wil-

His younger son born.

" that Cobham died in a room ascended by a ladder, at a poor woman's house in the Minories, formerly his laundress, rather of hunger, than of any more natural disease. Thus miserable was his fate, in meeting with a prince so inconsiderately profuse to strangers, that he forgot the owner, not leaving him wherewithal to buy bread: an impiety not found among infidels, who ever deem'd it less injustice to take away life, than the means to maintain it.

liam Sanderfon the elder, “ who was of kin to Raleigh; <sup>a</sup> and (as we are told) in the time of his “ prosperity and greatness, was his servant, intrusted with receiving great sums of money for “ him out of his office of wines, and his other places, by which he became in arrear to Ra- “ legb in divers great sums; which, after his troubles, he sent for to Sanderfon, who was so far “ from paying them, that he pretended Raleigh should owe him two thousand pounds: where- “ upon Sir Walter, in great anger, commenced a suit against Sanderfon, which was managed “ by his servant and solicitor John Shellbury; and Sanderfon, being overthrown, and found in “ arrear to Raleigh in very great sums, was cast into prison, where he died a beggar. Hence “ sprung all the spleen and malice of William Sanderfon the younger (in his history of king “ James’s reign) towards Sir Walter Raleigh,” as the author of the pamphlet whence this pas- sage is extracted, and which was written many years after Raleigh’s death, to detect the errors and falsities in that history, continues. <sup>b</sup> Now this exposure both of that author’s father and his own history, so enraged the son, that he forthwith publish’d an answer to the said pamphlet, in which he not only endeavours to support what he had written of Sir Walter Raleigh in his history, tho’ with no authorities or satisfactory reasons, but falls most foully upon Carew Ra- legh, as if he was the author of the pamphlet aforesaid against his history; and that, with such womanish spleen and slander as might have betray’d, had not himself own’d, that his wife had a hand in writing it. But of the passage here last quoted, tho’ he contradicts several particulars, he does not deny the main point; which is, that Sir Walter Raleigh, now after his reprieve, did commence suits by Shellbury against his father, which might naturally sharpen the son’s pen, and warp his impartiality, when he was representing him in his history, and the rather if Raleigh was such a debtor besides to his father, as he describes him. <sup>c</sup> But, who- ever was the author of those observations on the said history, he has not more unfavourably treated it, than others who examined it afterwards. <sup>d</sup>

WHEN Raleigh had got over these troublesome contests, all things appear’d, for a while, about him as serene, as in such a gloomy state could be hoped for; and he, who lately was upon the very brink of dissolution, had all his offices, lands and goods, seiz’d upon, and was himself committed a close prisoner, had not only his life repriev’d, and his confinement sweetned with some degrees of latitude, but even his estate also restor’d to him. For these lands (as should have been before observ’d, had Carew Raleigh’s case, whereof I had then but an imperfect extract, been, as it is now at hand) were actually made over by Sir Wal- ter Raleigh to his son, both inheritance and fee, before queen Elizabeth died, as formerly was also the lease for years; <sup>e</sup> so that, as he observes again in another place, “ being entail’d on “ Sir Walter’s heirs, he could not forfeit them, but during his own life; and the king, finding “ in himself the iniquity of Sir Walter’s condemnation, gave him all what he had forfeited “ again.” <sup>f</sup> Herewith agrees likewise Sir John Harrington, who not only tells us by whose restor’d him.

<sup>a</sup> For the said William Sanderfon the elder, who was much engag’d among the merchant-adventurers in queen Elizabeth’s reign, and one of her commissioners for the Spanish prize-goods; also of note for the great globes, which, by his encouragement, were brought to perfection; married, about the year 1571, Margaret Snedale or Snow- dale, the daughter of Sir Walter Raleigh’s sister Mary, by her husband Hugh Snedale, a commander in the queen’s royal navy, as we gather from a pamphlet written by their son William Sanderfon, more particularly mention’d a little lower.

<sup>d</sup> The character he gives of Sanderfon’s said History of king James, is as follows: “ His whole History is a “ Rhapsody of notes and scatter’d papers from other men, “ collected without order or method; exceedingly defec- “ tive both in time, place and nominations; and written “ in so unseemly and disjointed a style, that you may “ easily perceive he has taken up other mens words with- “ out understanding their matter; and unless it be where “ he rails on persons of honour (which he does plainly, “ and often, tho’ sometimes very falsely) his language “ is dark, harsh and unintelligible.” Dr. Heylin thought this character so just, that he has recited it in his Survey of Sanderfon’s History of Charles I. annexed to his adver- tisements on the said author’s History of the queen of Scots and king James, in his Examen Historiarum before men-tion’d; and farther confirms it with this character of his own: “ Sanderfon’s method is intricate and perplex’d, “ backwards and forwards, without care of time or or- “ der; telling the same thing over and over, and many “ times disagreeing in one place, from that which was “ affirm’d in another: his language rough and unpolish’d “ in most parts of the book, and in some parts ungram- “ matical; so that no sense can be pick’d out of it, but “ by circumstances, and in the way of conjecture only.” A little further he also gives it as the opinion of a judi- cious friend, “ That Sanderfon writes nothing like an “ historian, either for style or composure: his sentences “ many times nonsense, and his digressions tedious and “ impertinent.”

And Dr. Welwood, in his notes on Wilson’s history of king James, says, nothing could enhance the value of it more than “ a most wretched one publish’d by one Wil- liam Sanderfon; who pretends, in several places, to “ some secret memoirs or discourses with great men, to “ make good the passages of his history. But the truth “ is, the whole is nothing else but an ill-compil’d collec- “ tion out of other authors; wherein he, for the most “ part, mistakes or perverts their meaning. In cursorily “ reading over this history, I have sometimes taken no- “ tice of above four or five gross errors, either in names, “ things or chronology, in one single page.”

mediation Raleigh recover'd his said estate, and his enlargement in prison, but how laudably he employ'd himself there at the time of this author's writing, which might be about the year 1607; where he says, "God put it into the king's mind, against man's expectation, to save his life; and since, by the fruit of his faithful wife, both to preserve his estate, and to ease his restraint, in such sort as many, who are at liberty, taste not greater comforts than he doth in prison; being not barr'd of those companions, meaning books, that he may, and perhaps does, take more true comfort in them, than ever he took of his courtly companions in his chiefest bravery."<sup>a</sup>

BUT this prospect was soon overcast; for there was a young Scotchman, named Robert Car, who, soon after the said restitution, sprang up in great favour at court; and, having no fortune of his own, it was contrived by those who had gaped in vain for Raleigh's estate themselves, to lay the foundation of this favourite's future greatness upon his ruin: for, being thus frustrated of the effects of Sir Walter's attainder, they pretended to find a flaw in his last conveyance of the fee and inheritance of Sherborne to his son; and to this purpose an information was exhibited in the Exchequer by the attorney-general Hobart, to which Raleigh put in his answer; and therein the said grant or conveyance was set forth to be made over, as above: yet, for want of a single word (which was found notwithstanding in the paper-book, and was only the oversight of the clerk) they pronounced the conveyance invalid, and Sherborne absolutely forfeited to the crown; a judgment to be foreseen without witchcraft; since his chief judge was his greatest enemy, and the case argued between a friendless prisoner and the king of England.<sup>b</sup>

away again.

THEN was Sherborne given to this Car, afterwards earl of Somerset. The lady Raleigh and her children earnestly petition'd the king for compassion; but could now obtain no other answer from him, than that he mun have the land, he mun have it for Car. And she, a woman of high spirit, on her knees, prayed to God, that he would punish those who had thus wrongfully exposed her and her children to ruin.<sup>c</sup> We have an elegant letter of Raleigh's extant, to Car himself, upon this occasion; but, having been corruptly printed, as I have elsewhere observ'd,<sup>d</sup> it may appear from several ancient manuscript copies more correct, as follows: "After some great losses, and many years sorrows, of both which I have cause to fear I was mistaken in the end; it is come to my knowledge, that yourself, whom I know not but by an honourable fame, has been persuaded to give me and mine our last fatal blow, by obtaining from his majesty the inheritance of my children and nephews, lost in the law for want of a word. This done, there remains nothing with me but the name of life, despoiled of all else but the title and sorrow thereof. His majesty, whom I never offended (for I ever held it unnatural and unmanly to hate goodness) stay'd me at the grave's brink; not, as I hope, that he thought me worthy of many deaths, and to behold all mine cast out of the world with myself; but as a king, who, judging the poor in truth, has received a promise from God, that his throne shall be establish'd for ever. And for yourself, Sir, seeing your fair day is but now in the dawn, and mine drawn to the evening, your own virtues and the king's grace assuring you of many favours and much honour, I beseech you not to begin your first building upon the ruins of the innocent; and that their sorrows, with mine, may not attend your first plantation. I have been ever bound to your nation, as well for many other graces, as for their true report of my trial to his majesty, against whom had I been found malignant, the hearing of my cause would not have changed enemies into friends, malice into compassion, and the minds of the greatest number present into the commiseration of my state. It is not the nature of soul treason to beget such fair passions; neither could it agree with the duty and love of faithful subjects, especially of your nation, to bewail his overthrow, who had conspir'd against their most liberal and natural lord. I therefore trust, Sir, that you will not be the first that shall kill us outright, cut down the tree with the fruit, and undergo their curse, who enter the field of the fatherless; which, if it please you to know the truth, is far less fruitful in value than in fame: but that so worthy a gentleman as yourself will rather bind us to your service, being, Sir, gentlemen, not base in birth or alliance, who have interest therein; and myself, with my utmost thankfulness, will ever remain ready to

MS. p. 31. from archbishop Ussher's Observation in his Baconiana, printed 8vo. 1679. p. 77. where, speaking of the corrupt and embased copies, from which several of the letters in the Cabala were printed, he gives a particular instance in this letter of Sir Walter Raleigh's to Sir Robert Car; having compared it with the original, and found no fewer than forty difference between them, of which some were of moment.

“obey your commandments.” This letter, in one or two old copies, is dated December 1608.<sup>a</sup> But this so little prevailed upon Car, or any other applications Raleigh might make to the king, with his majesty himself; that besides Sherborne, and the manors belonging to it, those other lands which Raleigh himself had purchased, call’d, Pinford and Primesly, Barton, and the manors appertaining also thereunto, forfeited with the rest by his attainder, were also granted the following year 1609, or the seventh of his majesty’s reign, to the said favourite.<sup>b</sup>

BUT now, or not long after, Raleigh was grown into high esteem with that great hope and heir of these kingdoms, prince Henry Frederick, the king’s eldest son, who, being satisfied of his loyalty, and well inform’d of his great qualifications and experience in civil and military affairs, with his hazardous services for the honour and defence of his country, no less than his many publick-spirited adventures, both to enlarge and enrich it, testified not his own merits more in any one particular, than in distinguishing those of Sir Walter Raleigh; and, notwithstanding the many little envious detractions of some undermining courtiers about him, did both encourage his epistolary addressees to him from the Tower, and send for his counsel or opinion upon several emergent occasions. It was, perhaps, one of the brightest rays in the shining orb of this rare prince’s actions; that he never left invading the king with the most persuasive solicitations, that he would bestow Sherborne upon him, with full design to return it to its just owner, till his majesty at last granted his request: but by what cruel fate Raleigh’s hopes were eclipsed again, and indeed those of the whole kingdom, we shall suddenly hear.

How much respected by the prince of Wales.

IN the mean time, we must here endeavour to give such light of that intercourse which passed between the said prince Henry and Sir Walter Raleigh, as those letters and discourses, which he address’d to his highness, and are extant, will afford; and first, when he found how commendably the prince was inclined to the studies of navigation; how much delighted he was with a view of the fleet at Chatham; how inquisitive, or desirous to inform himself, by consultation with the most experienced commanders, in the knowledge of building ships most artfully, fitting them out most commodiously, sailing them most dexterously, and fighting with them most successfully, in order to execute those great designs he had upon the West-Indies and Spain itself, whenever the king thereof should give cause of publick hostility, as one of his own servants acquaints us, and would have done more distinctly, had he not been manacled in a courtly maxim so discrepant with all personal narrative; That to publish particulars, agrees not with rules of state:<sup>c</sup> Raleigh compos’d and communicated to his highness several trattates upon these subjects. Such was his letter touching the model of a ship, which the prince intended to build;<sup>d</sup> and such his discourse of a maritimal voyage, with the passages and incidents therein,<sup>e</sup> which he seconded with some necessary observations on the royal navy and sea service,<sup>f</sup> also dedicated to his highness; and wherein he appears to have been a most worthy and earnest counsellor of the prince, to a due regard and regulation thereof. For, says Raleigh to him, in answer to any objection that might be made to the maintenance of so great a fleet, in the perfection and readiness which he recommends, now in times of peace: “Tho’ the sword is put into the sheath, we must not suffer it to rust, or stick so fast, that we shall not be able to draw it readily when need requires;” and, a little further, “we may be assur’d, that if those powerful means, whereby we reduced our enemies to the courtesy of seeking peace of us, were neglected, so as we could not again, upon occasion, readily assume the use and benefit of them, as we have done; those proud mastering spirits, finding us at such advantage, would be more willing to shake us by the ears as enemies, than to take us by the hands as friends. Therefore, far be it from our hearts to trust more to that friendship of strangers, which is but dissembled upon policy and necessity, than to the strength of our own forces, which has been experienced with so happy success. I confess, that peace is a blessing of God, and blessed are the peace-makers; therefore doubtless blessed are those means whereby peace is gain’d and maintain’d. For well we know, that God works all things here among us, mediately and by a secondary means; the which means, of our defence and safety, being shipping and sea-forces, are to be esteemed as his gifts; and then only available and beneficial, when he withal vouchsafes his grace to use them aright.”<sup>g</sup> To this end,

His advice to the prince about the Royal Navy.

Raleigh also wrote another discourse for the said prince, Of the art of war by sea.<sup>a</sup> But the untimely death of his highness, as we shall too soon find, deprived both him and posterity of the advantages which a subject so useful and uncommon, from an author so able and experienced, did promise.

THERE is nothing in these discourses, or any other I have met with, which shew Raleigh any ways concerned in writing those propositions or arguments for foreign wars, which were delivered to prince Henry by some of his military servants, and which were afterwards abstractedly publish'd, together with an answer at large, written, very conformable to the taste of king James, by the learned Sir Robert Cotton; <sup>b</sup> tho', to the first edition of this treatise, the booksellers, having prefixed Sir Walter Raleigh's picture, have thereby misled some writers of his life, carelessly to insert this book into the catalogue of his writings. <sup>c</sup> 'Tis true, Raleigh has obliquely and subordinately touch'd this branch of the subject in some of his discourses upon war, but in other arguments than are here answer'd, nay after this answer was written; nor are they address'd to the prince, but indeed written also after his death. <sup>d</sup> In some places, he has given the greatest discouragements to a military life, from knowing, how many are deluded to be the executioners of other men's ambition, and to lay down their lives for what they should not venture them; <sup>e</sup> yet withal, the greater disproportion of honour and reward which attends that profession, than others of less personal hardship and danger, as was before partly observed. <sup>f</sup> In other places, he has written against wanton and causeless invasions, for the mere sake of brutish and vain-glorious victory; against waging war with our enemies, till we beat the art of it into them; till cowards are learnt to be courageous, and defenders become assailants: yet has elsewhere, in a very ingenious similitude, shewn, that martial policy is one of the principal supports of government. <sup>g</sup> However, when a prince has thereby got authority, or the sharpest means in his power, he would have the mildest use; and the one acquired in full strength, only that the other may be exercised with perfect safety: for he ever preferr'd reason and love as stronger chains of government than constraint or violence, <sup>h</sup> and thought that royal dealings was ever surest of meeting with royal success. <sup>i</sup> Such were the principles Sir Walter Raleigh infus'd not only into the prince of Wales, but all other readers throughout his writings; and agreeable hereto is the tenor of that letter he wrote to the said prince, August the 12th 1611, concerning the most eligible power in an English sovereign, where he has, with the spirit of a true patriot, said: "Let me not doubt but all plans, which do not carry in them the mutual happiness of prince and people, will appear as absurd to your great understanding, as disagreeable to your noble nature." <sup>k</sup>

And concerning the bell plan of government.

BUT now Raleigh's pen was engaged upon a different subject in the prince's service, and by his command: for, "the first overtures of a marriage between this prince and the eldest daughter of Spain being put off," <sup>l</sup> the like motion was now made by the Savoyan ambassador, not only for a marriage between prince Henry and a daughter of the duke of Savoy, but for another, of his son Don Phillibert, prince of Piedmont, with princess Elizabeth, the daughter of England. Raleigh wrote two discourses, upon this occasion, in the year last mention'd; and that he particularly was requested by the prince to give his opinion of the said

<sup>e</sup> His words are: "It may be affirm'd, the number of those that have been slaughter'd by their fellow-creatures, exceed the number of all the inhabitants that ever were at one time living upon the face of the earth; yet very few of this infinite number, thus untimely slain, were ever masters of the grounds of the disputes for which they suffer'd, or the true reason of their being led to the battle; the truth, with much artifice, being kept from all, but what were parties to the design resolv'd on. What deluded wretches then have a great part of mankind been, who have either yielded themselves to be slain in causes, which, if truly known, their hearts would abhor, or been the bloody executioners of other men's ambition! It is a hard fate to be

And, as those kings of trees have large tops, to have the king of men large crowns; whereof, as the first would soon be broken from their bodies, were they not underborn by many branches; so would the other easily totter, were they not fasten'd on their heads with the strong chains of civil justice and martial discipline." Raleigh's Remains (last edit.) p. 116.

offers, appears in his introduction to the first of those discourses, inscrib'd to some minister of state about his highness; in which Raleigh has so notably discover'd what a tool for "avarice and ambition most of the Catholic princes in Europe had made of this sacrament of matrimony;" and how notoriously "the Castilians, with those of whom these princes are descended, have gotten no less by the traffick of their marriages, than they have done by the trade of their Indies;" that I wonder these excellent political discourses were never made publick, for the more easy advertisement of our succeeding princes upon this topick. The second of them, upon the match for prince Henry, is treated under eight heads; and, in the fourth page of it, Raleigh has these words: "There is a kind of noble and royal deceiving in marriages between great kings and princes; yea it is, of all others, the fairest and most unsuspected kind of betraying: it has been as ordinary among them to adventure or cast away a daughter to bring some purpose to pass, as at other times, for saving of charges, to make them nuns." A little farther, having represented the duke of Savoy so tied to the see of Rome, both by religion and benefit, that he could no more be separated and subsist, than if his soul was divided from his body, he goes on thus, more directly, concerning the marriage: "What then remains of profit to our prince by this alliance? A sum of money, and a beautiful lady. For beauty (says he) it was never more cheap in any age; and it is ever better loved in the hope, than when it is bad: for the million of crowns offered, which makes but two of our subsidies, I speak it confidently; when those dukes, lords, and great ladies, who will attend the princess in her passage hither, shall be all presented with gifts according to their degrees and the king's honour; when the preparations, triumphs and feastings are paid for, there will nothing remain but a great encrease of charge, and, perchance, a great deal of melancholy." And a little further, Raleigh comes closer still, to the prince himself, in these words: "Now, if by these dislikes of the former alliances, you make judgment that it is my desire that the prince should not marry at all; I say, my desire is not, that the prince should not marry at all, but not as yet; and I am exceeding sorry that the prince has not the same desire. For seeing his majesty is yet but young, and by God's favour like to live many years; and that his highness, if he should now marry, may have many children born to him, before he be thirty years old; and, seeing all his children shall be princes, and must be provided for as princes, I think it will much perplex him to find himself so environ'd, till his majesty has somewhat repaired his estate, and provided beautiful gardens to plant these olive branches in. While the prince is unmarried, all the eyes of Christendom are upon him; for, with what king soever he shall be ballanc'd, he will cast the scale; but, to have him weigh'd with a little prince, I should be sorry, and he himself will be as sorry after. All the princes in Christendom woo'd Charles, duke of Burgundy, while his daughter was unmarried; and while our prince is free (our enemies not knowing upon what ground to build their practices) his majesty's safety is in the mean while infinitely assured; but, the prince once disposed of, they will presently muster our forces, measure our fortunes, sound us to the bottom, and make their approaches accordingly: they will then say, we have seen the utmost of the Prince of Wales!" Then having observ'd, that "since there is none but a Catholic lady for us, let us have a king on our side (says he) to boot:" so, in consideration of the many motives to enmity between France and Spain, which he enumerates; as also the many obligations which France then lay under, of gratitude to the crown of England, and the advantage of retaining the Netherlands, he proposes the daughter of the French king. On the other side, that it would be a needless hazard both to neglect this love and union, and sustain withal the hatred of the archduke, the pope, and the king of Spain together; however disunited, they were not to be feared: "For then, if they should combine against us, from whom should we hope for help? If it be from Savoy or Florence, God help us! Our friends inhabit beyond the mountains, our enemies at hand! We leave those that are strongest and nearest us, for those who are weakest and furthest off! We leave those that can help us, or harm us, for those that can do neither! Those we leave who depend on themselves, to wit, the French, for those who depend on others, to wit, the Savoyans and Florentines!" Thus ends Sir Walter Raleigh's discourse upon the marriage proposed for prince Henry.

In his other discourse, on the match that was offered for the ingenious and accomplish'd lady Elizabeth, that prince's sister, having copiously exemplified, as we have observ'd, what mercenary sacrifices had been made, by crown'd heads, of their children, in this grand market of matrimony; and answer'd the objection he foresaw some espanioliz'd courtiers might make, that seeing the kings of France, and especially of Spain, had so often match'd themselves with the dukes of Savoy, Why should not the king of England also accept of their alliance? He proceeds to examine what encrease of honour and dignity, or what great comfort or contentment this excellent young princess could expect or hope for by this match? “ For the first, to wit, “ honour and dignity (says he) as she is born the eldest, and now only daughter of one of the “ mightiest kings of Christendom, so is she thereby of higher place and state, than the wife “ of a duke of Savoy. Besides, in her birth and blood, both of father and mother, descended “ of such royal races, as Savoy cannot add any greater grace or glory to ; and by nature and “ education endow’d with such princely perfections, both of body and mind, as may well de- “ serve to be reputed a worthy spouse for the greatest monarch of Christendom, especially con- “ sidering the possibilities of a daughter of England, whereof we have had many precedents ; “ and, at this time, is happily manifested in the king’s majesty, our sovereign, being descended of “ a daughter of England ; whereby the whole island, formerly divided, is again now made “ one GREAT-BRITAIN, to the mutual strength of either. Now to confer the possibility of “ such a fortune, upon a poor popish duke of Savoy, that can return no recompence of benefit “ to this state, were greatly for his glory, tho’ little for the advancement of this noble prin- “ cess, and less for the safety of this kingdom, considering the dangers that it may draw upon “ our worthy magnanimous prince and the noble duke of York, if the ambition of this match “ should tickle the Savoyan to look after possibilities, wherein there would want neither means, “ persuasions nor pardons from Rome, to practise any villany in that behalf, whereby to bene- “ fit or strengthen an appendix of Spain, and so devoted a son to the Romish see. For the “ second, namely the comfort and contentment of this worthy young lady by this match, as there “ is little in appearance presently, so there is less to be hoped for in the future. For, as first, “ she must be removed far from her nearest blood, both by father and mother, into a country “ far estranged from our nation, as any part of Christendom. and as far differing from us in “ religion, as in climate. And what true correspondence, or matrimonial affection, there can “ be maintain’d between those persons, whose minds are different, and opposite in the religious “ points of their Christian faith, is greatly to be doubted. Moreover it is greatly to be feared, “ with what safety and security she can long live free from secret practices and treacheries, “ in a country so near the pope’s jurisdiction, environ’d with the plots of the Jesuits, who, we “ see, do daily traffick the lives and fortunes of all princes who are not wholly devoted to the “ Romish obedience ; and therefore how they will entertain or tolerate the race of our king, “ were too great an error and presumption to trust to : so as when the worthy lady, hereafter “ by her children or otherwise, has furnish’d their desire, and fully served their turn, she shall “ be then either forced to wound her conscience, by forsaking her faith, or else to undergo “ the scorns and danger which shall be daily cast upon her and her family, for the exercise of “ her religion. And this also we may be well assured of, that, if she shall have any issue by “ the prince of Piedmont, they must all be bred and brought up contrary to her conscience, “ which can be no small grief to a virtuous and natural mother, and as little comfort to our “ just religious king, their grandfather. Lastly, the very binding cause of amity between all “ kings, princes and states, is their trade and intercourse of their subjects. Now there is not “ any prince or state of Europe, the inland countries of Hungary and Transylvania excepted, “ but the English have trade withal ; yea even with the Turk, Barbarian, Persian and Indians ; “ only with the subjects of Savoy, I do not know that we have any meddling or interchange at “ all : for the duke has no port, his ditch of Villa-Franca excepted, which is only capable “ of a few gallies, either to furnish ships from, or to receive them, being strangers. And “ therefore for his majesty of England to match his eldest and only daughter with a prince, “ who has his dependance on other kings ; a prince jeshited, who can neither head us in time “ of war, nor trade with us in time of peace ; a prince, by the situation of his country, every “ way unprofitable to us ; and that, no less perilous for his majesty’s daughter to live in : I re- “ solve myself, that he is of too excellent a judgment ever to accept of it, and his honourable “ council too wise and provident to advise the prosecution thereof. Now, if his highness should “ be pleased to ask my opinion, with what Christian prince he should match his sister, were it “ in his own power and choice to make election, I humbly desire to be excused herein ; for, “ would it become me to presume so far ? It is true, I have heard it, that some overtures have “ been made for the prince Palatine of the Rhine ; certainly he is as well born as the duke of “ Savoy, and as free a prince as he is. The nation is faithful ; he is of our religion, and by “ him we shall greatly fasten unto us the Netherlands : and, for the little judgment which God “ has given me, I do prize the alliance of the Palatine of the RHINE, and of the House of “NASSAU, more than I do the alliance of ten dukes of Savoy.” And thus ends his discourse on the marriage of princess Elizabeth.<sup>a</sup>

WHAT follow'd was, that about a twelve-month after the writing of those Discourses, the said princess was married to Frederick, elector palatine of the Rhine,<sup>b</sup> afterwards king of Bohemia; a match which might have well answer'd all the advantages expected from it, at least one that had never been attended with such a series of calamities, were king James to have been moved, if not through honour and power, as a sovereign, yet through nature and affection; as a father, to have granted them a seasonable supply against their enemies. Instead of which, his indulging, beyond all apprehension of possibility, at least all production of precedent, a blessed peaceable temper, as his flatterers called it, to the sitting down a quiet spectator of his childrens overthrow, and their fortunes, occasion'd, not only all the lamentable wars which succeeded throughout Germany, to the utter ruin of his said son-in-law, and all the princes who assisted him; but also those of his successor at home, throughout his own dominions: For, daring not to draw his sword, through fear of offending the Spaniard, he sat musing at home, one while, how to raise money by privy-seals, benevolences, crown-lands and woods, either to cram his insatiable favourites, or else to fit out more prodigal and frivolous embassies, than would, by arms, have settled his children unmoveably in their throne; and, at other times, how to improve his sovereignty; or pick quarrels with his parliaments, and entail them to his heirs-general.<sup>c</sup>

As for the prince of Wales, he is said to have first encourag'd the prince Elektor to attempt his sister; desiring more to head an army in Germany, than he durst make shew of, and would, no doubt, have been bravely follow'd:<sup>d</sup> but alas! that fate, which so often suffers the unworthy to flourish, deprived this kingdom of prince Henry in less than a month after the arrival of the said Elektor. Some have insinuated, as if the Spaniards, because his highness approved Raleigh's Discourse touching a war with Spain, had a hand in his untimely end; alledging, that, if Philip the second cut off his own hopeful son Charles, for but pitying the people of Flanders, it can be no wonder he (or his son) should promote the destruction of a stranger, who did so far applaud the advice of Raleigh, as to say, No king, but his father, would keep such a bird in a cage.<sup>e</sup> But, from more intestine and unnatural sources, his sudden death is surmised by others to have sprung; the disease being so violent, that the combat of nature against it, in the strength of youth (he being almost nineteen years of age) lasted but few days. Here it is somewhat remarkable, that after Sir Theodore Mayerne, with Dr. Butler, Hamond, and other most eminent physicians, had used the utmost of their skill in vain, and had the least hopes imaginable left of the prince's recovery, that these should be at last center'd in some relief that might be had from Sir Walter Raleigh, and that a cordial from him (a state-prisoner) should be sent for, and, with consent or approbation, administer'd, when all other means had failed, and were given over, as we may gather from Sir William Cornwallis,<sup>f</sup> and other historians of those times. As to the effect, tho' it came too late, so that it might rather prolong pain than life for a few hours, and truly must have been a kind of miracle to have restored one so far exhausted, and on the point of expiring, for he died the same evening, being the 6th of November 1612: Yet, to observant readers, it is enough to manifest, first, what high reputation Sir Walter Raleigh's medicinal knowledge, through this Cordial, had now gained (and it afterwards encreas'd<sup>g</sup>) among the most skilful of the faculty; and secondly, the

His great Cordial sent for to the prince, at the point of death.

<sup>g</sup> Inasmuch, that there has been a distinct volume written upon this Cordial; whereby I find it is not to be taken for that which is called Sir Walter Raleigh's cordial, in a book entitled, as I remember, The Lady's Closet open'd: for that is only a simple strawberry-water. But this here meant, was his GREAT CORDIAL, as I find Raleigh, in one of his manuscripts, has styl'd it himself. This Cordial rose into such high repute, for its sovereign virtues, in the reign of king Charles II, and was so much recommended to and admir'd by him, that he commanded NICHOLAS le FEVRE, the royal professor in chymistry, and apothecary in ordinary to his majesty's household, to prepare a quantity of this precious remedy after the exactest manner, which the said chymist not only did, but composed in French also, under his majesty's auspices and command, a Treatise entitled, Discours sur le GRAND CORDIAL de SIR WALTER RALEGH, which he dedicates to the said king: and this was at the same time translated into English by PETER BELON, student in chymistry. For they were both licensed on the 23d of April 1664; tho' the translation appears to have been printed first, because it is dated that year: and the original the

the unsteady and incoherent opinions which were entertain'd of one and the same man's loyalty; that he, who was accused at his trial of a plot to extirpate the royal family, should yet be so far relied on to save it, as to have the lives first of queen Anne, as was before related, and now of prince Henry, trusted to his experiments. But, in a modern author, we have some further circumstances of this passage, which I have not elsewhere met with. For, having spoken of the particular esteem which prince Henry had contracted for Sir Walter Ralegh, the constant correspondence he kept with him by letters and messages, and of the solicitations he had so repeatedly made to the king for his liberty, as what might contribute towards his majesty's personal prejudice against Ralegh, he adds: "When the prince fell into his last illness, the queen sent to Sir Walter Ralegh for some of his cordial, which she herself had taken in a fever some time before, with remarkable success. Ralegh sent it, together with a letter to the queen, wherein he express'd a tender concern for the prince; and, boasting of his medicine, stumbled unluckily upon an expression to this purpose, That it would certainly cure him, or any other, of a fever, except in case of poison. The prince dying, tho' he took it; the queen, in the agony of her grief, shewed Ralegh's letter, and laid so much weight on the expression about poison, that to her dying day she could never be dissuaded from the opinion, that her beloved son had foul play done him." <sup>a</sup> If this was true, there might be a stress too confidently laid on this medicine, in supposing that nothing but poison could resist the power of it, and perhaps some inadvertency in starting such a suspicion in a fond mother, which (in the said modern writer's opinion) there might possibly be no ground for, and might, in the consequence, prove fatal to Ralegh himself; tho' the same author also knew, Ralegh was not the only man who started that suspicion; for he knew what the prince's domestic chaplain preach'd at St. James's on the dissolution of his highness's family; and he knew what the lord chief justice Coke not long after said in open court about the poisoning of others; but finds none more worthy, in this particular, than Sir Walter Ralegh, because he has not only selected most judiciously whatever is most choice and sovereign in the animal, vegetable, and mineral world; but has also manifested so much art and experience in the preparation of this great and admirable CORDIAL, as will, of itself, render him immortal: wherefore he says, he could not restrain the applauses owing to his honour and glory, which he has more than merited by that noble labour and profound study, that acquired him the sublime know- ledge he had in the virtues and qualities of all those in- gredients, which unite to the composition of this incom- parable remedy. So he proceeds to explain, first the vir- tues of every individual drug, which, together, cause those rare effects this CORDIAL daily produces (says he) as well towards the healthful, as the sick. Secondly, He spe- cifies how art helps nature in the harmonious and ex- quisite method of the preparation. Thirdly, Distinguishes the efficacy of it in maritime or islandic and northerly countries. Lastly, What a preservative it is, as well as restorative; and concludes with the exposition of the dose, the quantity, time and method of using it. Thus much concerning this Discourse on Sir WALTER RALEGH's great CORDIAL, of which the following particulars may be here farther observed: That the author le Febvre ac- knowledging, he had inserted two ingredients, by the coun- sel and approbation of the aforesaid Sir Kenelm Digby and Sir Alexander Fraiser, which were not mention'd in the first prescription, and which I have marked above in a different character, being the flesh, heart, and liver of vipers, and the mineral unicorn which some would have to be the white loadstone; it may induce the curious to enquire whether more liberties have not been taken with Sir Walter Ralegh's own genuine RECIPE. To this end, should be consulted the English copy thereof, in Sir Kenelm Digby's Collection of Receipts, printed a few years after le Febvre's book. Also Sir Walter Ralegh's book of Chymical Receipts, an original MS. in Sir Hans Sloan's library, marked B. 387. In which book (all written with Ralegh's own hand) there are, p. 63. b. these words, Our Great Cordial, and underneath, several ingre- dients set down, tho' not near the number above cited; but scor'd out again with a pen, tho' not illegibly. The next leaf is torn out, where 'tis supposed Ralegh had writ it more compleatly; and that, from this leaf, le Febvre's copy was taken. Lastly, There is a receipt of this cor- dial remaining with a lady, who is a descendant from Sir Walter Ralegh; but, whether agreeing with those in print, I have not, at this juncture, the leisure for making a request to be satisfied.

Archiatrorum Comitum.* Next follows the Receipt in these words: — "RECIPE *Rasuræ Cornu Cervi, libram unam; Carnis Viperarum cum Cor- dibus & Hepatibus, uncias sex; Florum Boraginis, Buglos- se, Roris-Marini, Calendulæ, Vetonice, Coronariæ rubræ, Roris solis, Rosarum rubrarum, & Sambuci, singulorum libram semissem; Herbarum Scordii, Cardui Benedicti, Melissæ, Dictamni Cretici, Menthæ, Majoranæ, Beto- nica, singulorum manipulos duodecim; Granorum Kermes recenter in rob redactorum, Cubebarum, Cardamomi majoris, Baccarum Juniperi, Maceris, Nucis Myristicæ, Caryophyllorum, Croci, singulorum uncias duas; Cinna- momi acutissimi, Corticis ligni Sassafras, flavedinis ma- lorum Citriorum & Aurantiorum, singulorum uncias tres; Lignorum Aloes & Sassafras uniuscujusque uncias sex; Radicum Angelicæ, Valerianæ, Carlinæ, Fraxinellæ seu Dictamni albi, Serpentariæ Virginianæ, Zedoariæ, Tormentillæ, Bistortæ, Aristolochiæ longæ, rotundæ & cavæ, Gentianæ & Imperatoriæ, singulorum unciam unam & semissem. Omnia incisa & grosso modo contusa in vase idoneo posita cum spiritu vini rectificato extraban- tur secundum Artem. Tincturæ filtratæ in extractum mediante, in Mariæ balneo, distillatione evaporentur. Magma expressum comburatur; cineres reverberati per aquam elixavientur, unde sol purum lege Artis paratur, quod extracto miscetur. His ita peractis, huic extracto adde, ut Artis est, Pulverem sequentem cæteraque ingre- dientia. RECIPE Lapidum Bezoardicorum Orientalium & Occidentalium verorum uniuscujusque unciam semissem, Magisterii solubilis Perlarum Orientalium uncias duas, Magisterii solubilis Corallorum rubrorum uncias tres; Boli Orientalis, Terræ sigillatæ veræ, Unicornu Mine- ralis, Cornu Cervi Philosophicè preparati, & Cornu Cervi calcinati, singulorum unciam unam; Ambrægri- seæ electissima in Essentiam redactæ, unciam unam; Moschi Orientalis optimi essentificati drachmam unam & semissem; Croci solis cum tinctura Antimonii Basilii Va- lentini parati drachmas duas. Sacchari candisati albi subtilissime pulverisati, libras duas. Ex his omnibus mixtis & ex arte unitis fiat Confectio vere Regia, quæ ad usum reservetur in pixidibus apprime clausis." Then the author aforesaid begins his Discourse with examples among the ancients of those who have made themselves famous by their remedies, as Mithridates, &c. and among the moderns, Mattheolus, B. Valentine, Paracelsus, and*

Sir Thomas Overbury: that it was to prevent the discovery of another crime of the same nature, committed upon one of the highest rank, whom he termed a sweet prince;<sup>a</sup> and indeed several histories of these times make no secret of it, where they shew the bickerings between prince Henry and the aforesaid favourite Car, in regard to the countess of Essex, not to mention other motives. However, the physicians about the prince gave it under their hands, which was spread abroad in several copies, that he died of a strong malignant fever, after they had anatomiz'd him to amuse the world (says another writer) and clear the suspicion of poison, as if no venoms could produce the like effects; while the king, to dispel the clouds and monitors of sorrow, commanded that no man should appear at court in mourning.<sup>b</sup>

WHATEVER was the cause of this excellent prince's death, Raleigh had no common share in the loss of him; his highness having, but a few months before he died, obtained Sherborne, with intention to return it him, as is already observ'd; and we are further inform'd, that king James, to satisfy his favourite Car, who was now viscount Rocheſter, gave him, instead thereof, twenty-five thousand pounds in money: so far was the crown from gaining by this purchase.<sup>c</sup> But now, after the prince's death, this Rocheſter got Sherborne of the king again; however (as some kind of composition or amends) his majesty, we are told by Raleigh himself, also gave his wife and son eight thousand pounds for the said estate.<sup>d</sup> But how it thrived with Rocheſter,<sup>The king's gift for his estate.</sup> is evident enough in the Histories of those Times; where it appears, that in little more than three years from this prince's death, the said favourite, by the title of earl of Somerſet, was arraign'd and condemn'd for that black and shameful business of poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury; whereby he not only lost Sherborne, but all those other possessions which the king had so lavishly heaped upon him; for what merits or services, may better appear in those Histories, than it is needful they should do here. As to Sherborne, on whom it was next bestowed, and upon what consideration, with the attempts made after Raleigh's death by his son Carew to recover it; since the accounts thereof would carry us too far beyond the period in these sheets propos'd, and indeed do more properly relate to the story of the son, than the father, I shall here refer to an abstract thereof, in a brief memorial of the said Carew Raleigh, at the bottom of the page;<sup>e</sup> for as to his elder brother Walter, whose right it had first been to have pursued

<sup>e</sup> Carew Raleigh was born, as is before observ'd, in the Tower, in the latter end of 1604 (or beginning of the next year) being aged about thirteen years at his father's death, as he tells us himself: became a gentleman-commoner of Wadham college in Oxford in 1620, as Anthony Wood informs us; but indeed rather sooner, because Carew Raleigh's own words are, that, after having been five years at Oxford, he came to court, and, by the favour of William earl of Pembroke, his noble kinsman, hoped to obtain some redress in his misfortunes; but the king, not liking his countenance, said, he appeared to him like his father's ghost: whereupon the earl advised him to travel, which he did till the death of king James, which happen'd about a year after. Then returning, and a parliament sitting, he, according to the custom of this land, petition'd to be restor'd in blood, that he might be enabled to inherit whatever lands might fall to him, as his father's heir, or any other way: but his petition having been twice read in the house of lords, king Charles sent Sir James Fullerton (then of the bed-chamber) for Mr. Raleigh, who being brought into the king's chamber by that knight, his majesty (after using him with great civility) told him plainly, that he had formerly promised Sir John Digby, now earl of Bristol, to secure his title to Sherborne (it being confer'd on him 14 of Jac.) against the heirs of Sir Walter Raleigh; whereupon Digby had given him, being then prince, ten thousand pounds; so that now he was bound to make good his promise, being king; and therefore, unless he would quit all his right and title to Sherborne, he neither could, nor would pass his bill of restoration. Mr. Raleigh urged the justice of his cause; that he desir'd only the liberty of a subject, and to be left to the law, which was never deny'd any freeman: but the king was positive, and so left him. After this, Sir James Fullerton used many arguments to persuade submission, as the impossibility of contending with kingly power, and the many inconveniences of not being restor'd in blood: all which consider'd, together with splendid promises of great preferment in court, and particular favours from the king, not improbable, wrought much in the mind of young Mr. Raleigh, who, being not full twenty years old (as he says himself) left friendless and fortuneless, it prevailed so far, that he submitted to the king's will. Whereupon there was afterwards an act passed 3<sup>o</sup> Caroli for his restoration; and, together with it, a settlement of Sherborne to the earl of Bristol; and, in shew of some kind of recompence, four hundred pounds a year pension, during life, was granted to Mr. Raleigh after the death of his mother, who had that sum paid during her life, in lieu of joynture. About a twelve-month after this, Mr. Carew Raleigh married the lady Philippa, relict of Sir Anthony Ashley, a rich young widow, by whom he had two sons and three daughters, and was not long after, at least before the year 1635, made one of the Gentlemen of the king's privy-chamber. Among the ingenious poems of Thomas Carew Esq; (who was another of those gentlemen) printed 8vo. 1640, p. 80. there is a compliment, To his cousin C. R. marrying the lady A. by which letters are to be understood this Mr. Raleigh, and that lady Ashley. As for the kind token, which Anthony Wood says the king honour'd him with at his majesty's leaving Hampton-court, and going into the Isle of Wight anno 1647, it was no more than a picture of the lady Stanley, as I remember, which was Mr. Raleigh's own property; therefore the king, among the letters he left on the table, desired, in one of them, the said picture might be returned him, as may appear by those letters which were then printed, or the extract of them in Heath's Chronicle. In the year 1650, and afterwards, several little tracts of his father's were publish'd and dedicated to him. In 1651, there was a committee for the sale of delinquents estates; and about that time the earl of Digby being fled to France, Mr. Raleigh had a fair prospect to recover his estate, therefore deliver'd his Cafe in to the said committee; and it was order'd, "That this Cafe be reported to the house with the opinion of this committee; That they conceive him a fit object of their mercy." He also, about the same time, drew up a brief Relation of Sir Walter Raleigh's troubles, and address'd it to the parliament. But whether printed before his death I know not, (the edition here used being dated three years after) nor wherefore his case and petition were laid aside. In 1656, came out the Observations on Sanderſon's history of king James, which this historian supposing to be writ by Carew Raleigh, publish'd an Answer to it the same year, with some scandalous and unworthy reflections therein upon him: But no one has given heed to them. He certainly made his court fued whatever prospect there was of retrieving the said estate, he died before their father, as will be more particularly remembred towards the conclusion of this work.

But which of these two sons was attended on in his adventures by Ben Johnson, is not easy to distinguish from the words of an author, who writes, “ That Johnson’s mother, having married “ to her second husband a bricklayer, took her son from Westminster school (where he had “ made a hopeful progress under the learned Camden) and made him work at her husband’s “ trade : till being pitied by some generous gentlemen, Camden got him a better employment ; “ which was to attend or accompany a son of Sir Walter Raleigh in his adventures, whereby “ gaining experience, he made his company acceptable among many.” <sup>a</sup> Now if this hap- pen’d before Ben Johnson took to acting or writing of plays, as our said author relates it did, then Sir Walter Raleigh’s eldest son was scarce old enough to go to school, much less upon ad- ventures. Besides, this son never made, that we can hear of, more than one adventure abroad, from which he never return’d ; therefore he could not part with his attendant or companion Ben Johnson in the manner our said author intimates he did after their return. Then if we sup- pose it the other brother, Carew, he never made any adventures at all, nor stir’d out of Eng- land till six years after his father’s death, and then only upon a short tour for about a twelve- month ; which was near thirty years after Ben Johnson became a dramatick poet or writer for the stage ; and when he seems rather to have wrote himself into his pension from the crown, or otherwise into such easy circumstances, as render it unlikely he should attend even on Carew Raleigh in those sorrows and difficulties he was then under ; and consequently in the whole, that either one or other should part with him not in cool blood, as our said author thinks, after their re- turn. Had the time of his going abroad with the younger or the elder brother been better adjusted, that particular of their parting would need no regard ; seeing by what trifles, what misunderstand- ings between themselves, or misrepresentations by others, such divisions are made between per- sons, who would, or might otherwise be most serviceable and beneficial to one another. If Ben Johnson was of such a surly and hypercritical disposition, as some men’s writings, and indeed some of his own, have represented him ; as it makes such parting the more plausible, if there had ever been any such meeting, so it is probable it would have distill’d with more acrimony from his pen, when he was giving a character of Raleigh as an author, than that he could find nothing to condemn either in his judgment or his stile. <sup>b</sup> But as for Raleigh’s temper, to all who had dependance upon him (and they were very numerous in the time of his felicity) espe- cially towards those of any liberal knowledge and education, it appears to have been of singu- lar candor and benignity. There are examples, further than what have been beforemention’d, of his courtesy, superior to that of many other great persons in his time, towards such men of parts as any ways relied on his patronage or protection ; and publicly asserted by those them- selves, who had tasted the benefits thereof. <sup>c</sup> He has also, under his own hand, recommended such generous treatment, as most coercive, especially to such as live under the power or com- mand of others ; and exploded the austere, the imperious regimen, as what is liable to betray its practitioners no less into peril than disdain ; where he shews, how contemptibly the vain, with affected sourness, counterfeit the gravity of the wise ; because the shadow of reverence, thereby obtain’d, has power to delude the eyes only of underlings ; and how thus, the time, where- in, by using it well, men might attain to be such as they ought, they usually mispend, in seek- ing to appear such as they are not : yet withal, not only how deceivable, but dangerous a course this is ; procuring, instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was fear’d. <sup>d</sup> Many other weighty counsels and useful precautions to this purpose, are dispersed up and down his writings, both in print and manuscript, which (for brevity) I forbare, here, to recite.

court to the commons of England, in hopes of getting Sherborne by their means. Hence Wood says, he cringed to men in power, and was made governor of the Isle of Jersey, by the favour of general Monk, in the latter end of January 1659, as Whitlock has recorded. At the restoration of king Charles II. his majesty would have confer’d some personal honour upon him, but he declined it in hopes of something better ; the king therefore knighted his eldest son Walter, who died soon after at West-Horsely, in Surrey, his father’s seat, which had, I think, been the earl of Derby’s ; for his will is dated from thence, as a friend who has seen it informs me. This was told after Mr. Raleigh’s death to Sir Edward Nicholas, secretary to king Charles. He had another seat at Kenton-Park near Hampton-Court, which, I think, he sold himself ; and dying in 1666, was buried in the church of St. Andrew, near Hampton.

according to A. Wood, in his father’s grave ; who further says, he has seen some sonnets of his composition, and certain ingenious Discourses in MS. also a poem set to musick by Mr. Henry Lawes. Sir Henry Wotton, in his letters, gives him the character of a gentleman of dextrous abilities, and he is by others mentioned with honour ; but far, God wot (says Wood) was he from his father’s party, either as to the sword or pen.

<sup>c</sup> See Thomas Churchard’s dedication of his Spark of Friendship to Sir Walter Raleigh : a scarce old tract, lately communicated from the Bodleian library at Oxford, or it had been more particularly made use of in the place where it is before mention’d.

But here, as Raleigh has been occasionally mention'd in the character of an Author, we are reminded, that it is high time he should be consider'd more particularly in that light; which cannot in any place more properly be done, than in this sedentary part of his life, when most of his works were written. Here then we are arriv'd at that part of his story, wherein he will appear, rather a collegian than a captive; a student in a library, than a prisoner in the Tower. On this occasion, we cannot but reflect, how well such productions, in such a situation! Such spacious exercises of genius, in such a contracted state! will prove, that, 'Tho' the soul of man, by a fly, or a hair, may be separated from the body, tyranny itself cannot confine it to the body; and, at the same time, how trifling a calamity confinement must be, to those who have well employ'd their liberty. Some men, impatient under so many years restraint, would have pined obscurely away with despair; and others, with rage, have made their bonds more galling: but Raleigh, as in many other disasters, so in this, has left us no common example of an heroick mind. In him we may observe, there is no levelling a sublime spirit with the subalterns of Nature: press it on one part, it will still rise in another; and be like some hardy plants we may have seen, whose heads will shoot forth and flourish in the sight of mankind, tho' their roots are closely fetter'd in walls of stone. Happy then are they, who in their youth have so fortified themselves with knowledge, and attained to such a relish of literature, that, wheresoever they are driven by the persecutions of power, they can make the contemplation of wisdom beguile the sense of their sufferings! Who out of the most prevailing examples in all ages, of patience and prudence in all exigences, can set themselves lessons of fortitude, and tasks of imitation! Who can, out of the misfortunes of others, extract consolations for themselves; or partake in their prosperity, and make it tributary to their own contentment! Such carry with them an infallible, an undeprivable solace; which can relieve them in poverty with inestimable treasure, and manumise them in prison with intellectual liberty: for the multitudes of anxieties which surprise illiterate and uncultivated minds, even in the midst of the most splendid affluence or adulation, are inaccessible to them, under the darkest clouds of indigence or reproach.

That Raleigh, in his greener years, did attain to such a taste of letters as all his succeeding avocations could never remove; and which proved not only an ornament to those his earlier and happier days, but a relief in his age and afflictions, even so as to render him under his darker fortunes and condition more illustrious than he was in his brightest prosperity, may appear by a survey of his writings from the juvenile productions of his pen, to the more numerous and mature offsprings of his present confinement. But in this survey, we think not the simple chronological method will be either needful or acceptable; which tho' easiest and readiest for transcribing, would be most crude and disjointed in reading; and yet be incapable of admitting all into their true order, because we have not the time that several of his pieces were written. Therefore, that we may carry on our discourse with some coherence, we shall attempt at such a digestion as, upon a little review, will naturally arise, or most conveniently, at least in this place, lead us, as out of a flowry garden, into the high-road again of publick action: for I might, perhaps, recommend some variation, in this arrangement, of the same pieces if they were to be reviv'd in a uniform and methodical edition of Sir Walter Raleigh's Works; so that the junior efforts of his musè, or more extemporary products of his epistolary correspondence might not, as here for dispatch, lead up the rest.

Now as for these productions of his musè, since several of them are mention'd in the former part of these sheets, they need be here only recapitulated; as his poem on Gascoign's Steele-Glass; The Excuse, The Silent Lover, the Answer to Marloe's Pastoral; with his poem of Cynthia, and two more on Spencer's Fairy Queen. Since the time that these seven were before spoken of, I have met with four other such like poetical pieces, which seem also to have been compos'd by the same hand, from those elegant tautologies or retornellos wherein his sonnets and madrigals are usually so correspondent with one another.* These were all written long before this his imprisonment, as were probably some also in the Asbmolean library; namely, Erroris Responsio, and * Three of these pieces are to be found in an old Collection of several ingenious Poems and Songs by the Wits of the Age: printed in 8vo. 1660, and annexed to a comical speech in prose, call'd Le Prince d'Amour, printed the same year; which, by the latter part thereof, entitled Noctes Templarie; or, A brief Chronicle of the dark Reign of the bright Prince of banishing Love, appears, in a volume of the Harleian MSS. 90. C. 7. fol. 556, to have been written by Sir Benjamin Rudyard. The poems publish'd with this speech are improperly said, in the title, to be written by the wits of the age in regard to the time they were publish'd: for, as the publisher owns, in his dedication to the honourable society of the Middle Temple, the wit in this collection was born long before our unhappy intestine divisions, and as much in the poems themselves is evident; there being among them several written in the time of king James and queen Elizabeth; and one, or more, as old as king Henry VIII. Among the rest, one we have page 131. entitled, The Lover's Maze, a poem of four stanzas, beginning thus: Her Ear, her Tongue, her Wit, &c. 'Tis all compos'd of monosyllables, and with that ingenious intricacy or transposition which happily an-

and his Answer to the Lie, &c. Besides, we find there is a satirical elegy on the death of the treasurer Cecyll, earl of Salisbury, written within this period, likewise ascrib'd to him; <sup>a</sup> and we have still three pieces more of his poetry written afterwards, and but a short time before his own death. These are of a solemn nature; as his Pilgrim, his Epigram in Allusion to the Snuff of a Candle; lastly, a divine stanza, which is call'd his Epitaph. <sup>b</sup>

Epistolary.

Next we might speak of those shorter pieces also in prose, his Letters; and these, being written in all parts of his life, cannot perhaps be improperly enumerated in this. I have seen of them in print and manuscript to the number of twenty-eight: Fourteen or fifteen of them have already been made use of in the foregoing sheets; and the rest, as they likewise are of personal import, will be serviceable in the remainder, so they need not be more particularly distinguish'd in this place.

Military.

But those more continued compositions which were the result of experience and occasion in his several publick professions or engagements of life, will, perhaps, first demand our observation; such as relate to his character as a warrior, a sailor, a discoverer of unknown countries, and a politician vers'd in the interest of nations and the arts of government. Among these, we may first mention his military discourses; and these concern either a defence of England in particular, or contain general arguments and examples of the causes and reasons of war among mankind. On the former subject, he seems to have drawn up several remonstrances which are but sparingly and slowly come to light. However, from what has before been observ'd, of his having had a principal hand in the determinations of the grand Council of War for putting the nation in arms when it was under immediate apprehensions of the Spanish Invasion, there is good reason to believe he was also the author of a treatise, containing Notes of Direction for such Defence of the Kingdom: written three years before, when the said enemies were beginning to shew their designs. To this treatise was also join'd a Direction for the best and most orderly Retreat of an Army, whether in Campaign or Straits. And these were then presented in MS. to the privy council. Herein, one advice is, since frontier forces are unlikely to prevent an enemy from landing, that if they should land, through the deficiency or absence of our shipping (for this is the force Raleigh was ever for having first us'd against such foreign invasions) it were better by driving or clearing the country of provisions, and temporizing, to endeavour at growing stronger, and rendering the enemy weaker, than to hazard all by a confused and disorderly descent of the populace to oppose the first landing, as their custom heretofore was. But this, chiefly, among the said reasons and positions, for preventing an invading enemy, was a little before the approach of the Spanish Armada oppugned by Thomas Digges, Esq; muster master-general of her majesty's forces in the Low-Countries, in a Discourse of the best Order for repulsing a foreign Force, &c. which he then exhibited in print. This produced an Answer, which, having been found in an old manuscript copy among others of Sir Walter Raleigh's Discourses, has lately been published; and which, by several circumstances therein, agreeing with many in his life as well as with several orders in the aforesaid council of war, several passages in his History of the World, and his other writings, offers many reasons to believe it was written by him. <sup>c</sup> But if we would see his opinion upon this subject in a more extensive and universal manner, fers the title. This is follow'd in the next page with another, of three stanzas, entitled Farewell to the Court; beginning thus: Like truthless dreams, so are my Joys exp'd: this is again succeeded in the ensuing page by another of equal length, call'd, The Advice; with this beginning: Many deserve, but few or none deserve; and all three subscribed H. R. They are apparently, by the style, written at the time that Sir Walter Raleigh was celebrated for such kind of compositions, and from the subject, of the two last especially, no less manifestly to me, written by himself; the one just before his first Guaianian expedition, the other, to the lady that was his wife. Lastly, the fourth poem above refer'd to, is lately printed in a miscellany call'd, The London Magazine, for Aug. 1734.

<sup>a</sup> This Pastoral Elegy on the earl of Salisbury, who died in May 1612, was first printed by F. Osborne in his Memoirs of King James, and it begins thus: Here lies the final our Pastor achile e'er, &c. That author tells us, "It came from so smart a pen, in the king's sense, that he said, He hop'd the author would die before him: who he was (concludes he) God knows." The first person I have met with who ascribes it to Sir Walter Raleigh is the author of his life, printed in 8vo. 1677 (and afterwards in folio) whom Anthony Wood calls John Shirley, the writer of several romances and such like things. The writer in that life, page 119 says, that Raleigh for Cecil's kindness, bestow'd upon him that epitaph, "Which "I am, says he, upon very good grounds, assur'd to be his."

<sup>c</sup> 'Tis entitled, A Military Discourse: whether it be better for England to give an Invader present Battle, or to temporize and defer the same, &c. Now publish'd by Nathaniel Booth, of Grays-Inn, Esq; 8vo. 1734. containing 52 pages. The Author, in his introduction, tells us, "He has thought good, first to set down the reasons alledg'd on both sides, as he finds them collected by his antagonist; and after a reply to his objections, refers himself to the censure of the reader who is a soldier; not caring, in this cause, for the disallowance of any, who will bring a pound of antique usages and customs to weigh down only an ounce of true reason and fresh experience." Then he sets forth that Brief Discourse of the best Order for repulsing foreign Forces, &c. abovemention'd; which having been reprinted under the title of England's Defence, a Treatise against Invasion, Folio 1680, and under the name of Thomas Digges, as I have found in the copious library of a learned acquaintance; it is therefore ascribed to him above. That discourse of Digges's which in this military discourse begins at page 4, and ends page 13, is accompany'd in almost every article with our respondent's marginal notes, and attended at the end with a reply to the reasons therein; the whole winding up with the chief points of his former treatise, collected into brief notes.

manner, it must be in his Discourses of the original and fundamental cause of natural and necessary, arbitrary and customary, holy and civil wars; which tho' also publish'd several years after his death, have sufficient marks of genuineness upon them. There are other writings of his besides, which relate to this topick. But as war in them is treated of subordinately, and rather with respect to some national advantages wherewith it might have been maintain'd against our enemies as the posture of affairs then was, or the personal behaviour of some particular men, so we may think it more proper to speak of them under other divisions.

Among these, that which admits of his Maritime Discourses, may not perhaps be least observable, being a subject so scarcely handled by men of such learning and experience, yet of such importance to a people in our situation. And under this head, that which should here be perhaps first spoken of, tho' indeed one of the last pieces he wrote in this state of duration is, his Discourse of the Invention of Shipping, &c. <sup>b</sup> wherein he treats of the use, defects, and improvements direction, as is above observ'd, which he had presented to some of the lords of the council in 1585; and which gave occasion to Digges his said Brief Discourse in or near the year 1588, and that produced this Military Discourse about or soon after 1590, including the same, and comprising the whole of the controversy. The Editor of this pamphlet, in his dedication to the Duke of Argyle, has these words to his Grace: "Having lately, among some other valuable papers of Sir Walter Raleigh, found the following dissertation in manuscript, I thought the publication thereof was a debt due to my country, as well as to the memory of that great man." And I have in the copy which the said gentleman communicated for my perusal, mark'd out near twenty passages and expressions, which so well agree with others in the life and writings of Sir Walter Raleigh, that I cannot think any other person to have been the author of those notes and reply. Such among the rest are his being in the wars of France and Flanders, particularly the battle of Moucuntor, and that of Rimenant; his perfect knowledge of Dover haven, and other incidents mention'd before in his life: besides his historical observations of other persons; which, with several reasons and arguments about landing of forces, and the unproportionable speed of marching up an army to keep pace with the sailing of a fleet, almost in the same words as we have before observed out of his History of the World, and his other writings.

<sup>b</sup> This appears in several parts to be a genuine piece of our author, but incorrectly printed; as most of his posthumous works are, especially in the proper names. 'Tis the first discourse in a book call'd, Judicious and select Essays and Observations of that renowned and learned Knight Sir Walter Raleigh; printed in 8vo. 1650 1667, and (this Discourse of Shipping) reprinted again, among the Genuine Remains of Sir Walter Raleigh, at the end of an abridgment of his History of the World, 8vo. 1700. That book of Essays is dedicated, by the bookseller, to the much honoured Carew Raleigh, Esq; &c. And this first Discourse therein consists of 42 pages; yet seems an unfinished piece, and at the end, to our great regret, no more than the first chapter of a larger work. As the time when the Discourse beforemention'd of the causes of war was written, may be guess'd from that passage in it concerning the maritime controversy between Edison and Edison to the time when this Discourse of Shipping was compos'd, may be likewise infer'd from Sir Walter's reference page 39, to a pamphlet call'd The Trades Encrease, which I have seen and observ'd to be printed, 4to. 1615: unless there was a prior edition. Of both these Discourses I have been oblig'd with two old manuscript copies by Nathanael Booth, of Grays-Inn, Esq; beforemention'd. They seem to have been corrected from the printed copies in some places, and indeed will not yield many considerable corrections of them in others. There may need no apology for the following extract from this last discourse of our author's observations on the Improvement of Shipping in his own Time; since he is affirm'd to his immortal glory, to have had himself so great a share in it.

"Whosoever was the inventor, we find that every age has added somewhat to ships, and to all things else. And in my own time, the shape of our English ships has been greatly better'd. It is not long since the striking of the top-mast (a wonderful ease to great ships both at sea and harbour) has been devised, together with the chain-pump, which takes up twice as much water as the ordinary one did. We have lately added the bonnet and the drabber. To the courses we have devised fludding sails, top-gallant sails, sprit sails, top-sails. The weighing of anchors by the capston is also new. We have fall'n into the consideration of cables, and thereby resist the malice of the greatest winds that can blow; witness our small Milbrook-men of Cornwall, that ride it out at anchor half seas over between England and Ireland, all the winter quarter: and witness the Hollanders, who were wont to ride before Dunkirk with the wind at north-west, making a lee-shore in all weathers. For true it is, that the length of the cable is the life of the ship in all extremities; and the reason is, because it makes so many bendings and waves, as the ship riding at that length, is not able to stretch it, and nothing breaks that is not stretch'd. In extremity, we carry our ordnance better than we were wont; because our nether-overloops are raised commonly from the water between the lower part of the port and the sea. In king Henry VIII's time, and in his presence at Portsmouth, the Mary Rose, by a little sway of the ship in casting about, her ports being within sixteen inches of the water, was over-set and lost, and in her that worthy knight Sir George Carew, cousin-germain to the lord Carew now living; and with him, besides many other gentlemen, the father of the late renowned Sir Richard Grenville. We have also raised our second decks, and given more vent thereby to their ordnance lying on our nether-overloops. We have added cross-pillars in our Royal ships, to strengthen them, which being fastned from the keelson to the beams of the second deck, keep them from settling or giving way in all distresses. We have given longer floors to our ships than in elder times, and better bearing under water; whereby they never fall into the sea, after the head, and shake the whole body or sink stern nor sloop upon a wind, by which the breaking loose of our ordnance or disuse of them, with many other discommodities are avoided. And to say the truth, a miserable shame and dishonour it were for our ship-owners, if they did not exceed all other in setting up of our Royal ships; the errors of other nations being far more excusable than ours: for the kings of England have for many years been at the charge to build and furnish a navy of powerful ships for their own defence, and for the wars only; whereas the French, Spaniards, Portugals and Hollanders, till of late, have had no proper fleet belonging to their princes or State." Thus far Sir Walter Raleigh, in his said Discourse of Shipping, p. 16, &c. And thus much of it may not be thought in pertinent in his Life, at least in this subsequent manner, since such improvements, as some of them

ments thereof; the strength and deficiency of the sea forces of England, France, Spain and Venice, with five causes of the rise of the Hollanders: his encouragement of a mutual friendship between them and England, as also of the Newcastle trade. This might lead us more particularly to his excellent Observations and Notes concerning the royal Navy and Sea Service,<sup>a</sup> which he dedicated to the prince of Wales as is before mention'd; therefore all we need observe more of it in this place is, that herein he discourses under distinct heads, of the officers of the navy, of some errors to be reformed in ship-building; and others, in barboring and manning the fleet; of furcharging them with great ordnance; the defects in sheathing and calking; the abuses in viſtualling; inconveniency of the cook-rooms; of mustering and pressing mariners; of arms and munition; and lastly, of captains to serve in his majesty's ships. With the second head or chapter in this tract, agrees his letter to prince Henry before spoken of, concerning the model of a ship.<sup>b</sup> And in his introduction to the said Observations, as was also said, our author mentions a Discourse of a maritimal voyage, with the passages and incidents therein,<sup>c</sup> which he had formerly written to that prince. This, if it is now in being, must, I think, remain still in manuscript; for no other knowledge of it have I elsewhere met with; therefore it has, I fear, endured the same fate with that other work, probably, more copious and considerable, and to which, as what might seem design'd to bring the others into practice, they may appear only preparatory. This work, tho' taken notice of by no other author who has written of him, is thus mention'd by himself. "Of the Art of War by Sea, I have written a treatise to the lord Henry, prince of Wales. A subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any Man ancient or modern: but God has spared me the labour of finishing it, by the loss of that brave prince; of which, like an eclipse of the sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and sorrows: I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him: Curæ leves loquuntur; ingentes stupent."<sup>d</sup> This may lead us up to such of his discourses as represent this art in execution, particularly those two gallant naval actions wherein Sir Richard Grenville lost his life, and himself won a most signal victory, of which his own pen has preserved the faithful memorials in his Report of the Truth of the Fight about the Isles of Azores,<sup>e</sup> and his epistolary account of the Action at Cadiz; <sup>f</sup> both of them before abstracted into this work. Nor did his care terminate in the best advice for the regulation and maintainance of our shipping, or in recording some of the most notable atchievements perform'd therewith, but extended to the choice and reparation of the most convenient harbours for their reception; and that not only by his speeches in parliament, as we have already seen, but also by a memorial he presented to queen Elizabeth touching the port of Dover in particular; declaring how honourable and profitable to her majesty; how necessary and commodious for the realm, the rebuilding it would be; with the least expensive, and most perfect manner of performing the same.<sup>g</sup>

Geographical But if we advance to his more extensive pursuits and performances relating to that topick, they will lead us into a new Geography, into discoveries and descriptions of unknown countries, with the Voyages which himself and others under his charge and directions made to that purpose. And under this head would fall those papers and discourses of his, concerning the discovery, plantation, and settlement of Virginia, which were in the possession of Sir Francis Walsingham, as was before observ'd; <sup>h</sup> but whether now recoverable I know not, nor what is become of his Trea- them seem to have a nearer relation to him, than, through his prudence, in the state he now was, or perhaps the notoriety of his share in these improvements, it was needful further to express; for I have read in the Appendix to a History of the Inventors of Arts and Sciences, printed 12mo. 1686. That we owe the serviceable model of our modern ship building to the inventions or directions of Sir Walter Raleigh. And to the same purpose of effectually employing this his superior knowledge in naval architecture to the safeguard and strength of the nation, we may presume those grants were made him by queen Elizabeth for filling of Timber; one whereof is extant, entitled a Warrant to Sir Walter Raleigh for two hundred Oaks, to be taken in Sir Francis Englesfeld's woods; and it is preserved in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford.

<sup>e</sup> Of the Report of the Fight about the Azores, containing about two sheets, i.e. in this narrative of Sir Walter Raleigh's life, the abstract and references from fol. 60 to 63, add the note to the first reference in fol. 47. And see farther concerning the same, we may observe that it seems to have given matter for an heroick poem; which was, a few years after the said Report, published: Entitled The most honourable Tragedy of Sir Richard Grenville, Knt. 8vo. 1595, dedicated to the lord Monjoy by Jervis Markham. 'Tis compos'd in stanzas of eight verses, and near ninety pages in length.

<sup>f</sup> This Relation of the Cadiz Action, contains near 7 pages, among the Remains at the end of an Abridgment of Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, 8vo. 1700, was then first publish'd by Philip Raleigh, Esq; and is apparently a genuine piece, as may be gather'd from those other accounts interwoven and agreeing with it, where it is (mostly) before inserted, fol. 95.

<sup>g</sup> This Memorial touching Dover Port is also before refer'd to, fol. 143. It consists of about two sheets in the pamphlet there mention'd, call'd An Essay on Ways and Means to maintain the Honour and Safety of England, published by Sir H. Shreve, 4to. 1701. The publisher says, page 9, for the part ascribed to Sir Walter Raleigh goes no further; that he found this part of the memorial drawn up by Sir Walter Raleigh or Sir Dudley Digges among the rubbish of old papers, while he serv'd in the office of ordnance. But I think it could not be writ by Sir Dudley Digges, because the author directing himself to queen Elizabeth, speaks familiarly of things he had seen in the Low Countries in her time, when Sir Dudley Digges had not left the university.

tise of the West Indies, which seems to have been a very comprehensive work by the short sketch himself has given of its contents before quoted. <sup>a</sup> Better luck seems to have befall'n his writings upon Guiana; for we have at least four of his discourses on that country in being, tho' they, probably, are not all he writ thereon; as first, his Considerations on the Voyage for Guiana, which I never saw in print. <sup>b</sup> Secondly, his Discovery of the large, rich, and beautiful empire of Guiana, which he printed himself, and being, before, largely used and spoken of, the less need be said of it here. <sup>c</sup> Thirdly, his Journal of his second Voyage to Guiana. This remains still in manuscript, and perhaps should do so; it being unfinish'd and full of chasms, seeming to contain only notes and observations for his own memory, when he should have leisure at his return into England to digest and fill up the particulars in a continued discourse: accordingly it seems to have supply'd him therewith, when he wrote his Apology for the said Voyage. But as both these will be made use of in the subsequent part of our narrative, 'twill be then time enough to speak more distinctly of them. And there also will be mention'd the four or five letters we have of his extant concerning the said last expedition.

After his writings, becoming the character of an able commander both by land and sea, if we look for him as an author in the civil or political capacity, we may find him there also no less eminent; we may behold him in this light no less qualified to govern nations, than in the other to conquer and defend them. Some of his compositions under this distribution, are of a general nature; as that call'd the Seat of Government, shewing it to be upheld by the two great pillars of civil justice and martial policy; and how this is fram'd out of the husbandmen, merchants and gentry of the realm. The first of these ranks or degrees he calls the fruit trees of the kingdom; or those who gather the honey, yet hardly enjoy the wax: and as these feed, so the second sort enrich it; nourishing such trades as have assisted our kings with great sums of money, and great fleets, upon occasion; while the third sort, our gentry, he calls the garrisons of good order throughout the realm; or means rather they have been, or should be such, more than they were in these latter times, to agree with a note he has elsewhere dropt upon them. <sup>d</sup> But this little essay appears, by one expression towards the conclusion (mentioning something to be hereafter prov'd, which is not) to be no more than a fragment. <sup>e</sup> The like we apprehend of his Observations concerning the Causes of the Magnificency and Opulency of Cities, from a word in the very first paragraph, referring to such people as seem to have been before mentioned. <sup>f</sup> Tho' in the main this is a general discourse, it bears some particular references to a rude and barbarous people; and might possibly be the result of such considerations as must have engaged his mind, when those propositions were on foot for founding the City of Raleigh in Virginia, as was before intimated. In this little essay, after having spoken of the means to civilize and reform such a people, he proceeds, under distinct heads, to treat of the best situation of cities for safety and plenty; of the multitude of inhabitants, religion, academies, courts of justice, artificers, sheets, and the other in Hakluyt, about 9, also one in Latin before mention'd, printed in 4to. at Noremburg with a map: there are accounts of two editions of Sir Walter Raleigh's voyage to Guiana in Dutch, one 4to. 1612, which must be this of his discovery, and the other in 1619. Edmund Howes, in his Addition to Stow's Annals, says, it has been translated almost into all languages. But whether the exquisite translation into Latin, he says there is of it in one of Theodore de Bry's volumes of Modern Navigations, is the same with the Latin edition in 4to. before mention'd, or any such there is among those valuable volumes, I am not yet certain; tho' I remember much in one of them, printed at Frankfort, Fol. 1590, relating to the first Virginian voyages; whereby it appears, Sir Walter Raleigh was a great patron and encourager of the said author, and which would have confirmed or embellished some passages in that part of these sheets which gives account thereof, had the intelligence, I have since been favour'd with by an honourable gentleman, arrived timely enough to have been admitted in its proper place.

<sup>b</sup> The contents of this manuscript may be conceived from the words wherewith it begins, which are as follows: "Touching the voyage for Guiana, it is to be consider'd; first, Whether it be to be undertaken? secondly, The manner of subduing it; and lastly, The means how to subdue it, and annex it to the crown imperial of England." It consists of eight leaves in quarto, and is, I believe, a rarity; having no where met with it but among the magnificent collections of Sir Hans Sloane.

<sup>e</sup> This Seat of Government was printed first, I think, in Raleigh's Remains, 12mo. 1651, and in the last or largest edition is not above 4 pages, beginning thus: They say that the goodliest Cedars, &c. as is in a note before quoted.

privileges, and triumphs; so concludes with those three causes of confirming a city in her greatness, justice, peace and plenty. Of a more extensive nature still is that treatise we have of his, called Maxims of State; <sup>a</sup> being a methodical compendium of government in all or most of its forms and branches; with many of its chapters analytically digested for the sake of brevity and perspicuity. Herein having explain'd and defin'd the words government, policy, state and the office of sovereignty, he proceeds to distinguish the several sorts of monarchy, aristocracy, free state, tyranny, oligarchy, and commonwealth. Then of the founding a state, with its parts, and of preserving it under those several forms, by mysteries or sophisms, rules or actions. Lastly, the conversion of states, general and particular, by foreign invasion, domestick sedition, or alteration without violence. Thus ends this treatise; to which is join'd, as a kind of corollary for the better use of the book, two or three passages in the story of David: from whence an inference is drawn, that old age is not always unfit for government; and also a defence of that prince for marrying Abishag: so closes with a portrait of political nobility, in the story of Adonijah aspiring to the kingdom; with observations of the marks to discern such practices; and another of the political prince, in a farther example of the said king David; who, tho' aged, deserted, and rebell'd against by many of his nobles, stir'd up himself to publick action, and thereby shew'd his vigor and sufficiency to manage the affairs of his kingdom. Herewith may be mention'd that larger treatise bordering upon these subjects, which is call'd The Arts of Empire, &c. <sup>b</sup> but handled in a different manner. It is divided into twenty-six chapters, defining publick weals, and differences of sovereignty; more particularly the three kinds of monarchy, and how to perpetuate them. Also of councils and counsellors, officers, commissioners, magistrates and ministers of state. Of justice, treasure and war. Of neighbouring princes. The character of an excellent prince. Art of ruling. Of princely authority, power and force. Of conspiracy and treason, publick hatred, diffidence and dissimulation. Of war, defensive and invasive, law of arms, soldiers and their discipline. Of generals and commanders, councils of war, directions tactic and stratagemic; with advice how to make an honourable peace. Of civil war; with the causes and remedies thereof. And the two last chapters contain a collection of political observations, and maxims of state; or prudential grounds and polemical precepts concerning all states and forms of policy, &c. confirm'd by select narrations and historical parallels.

But if we descend to those political writings of our author, which were occasionally compos'd; and with more particular regard to the exigents of state in his own time, through the virtues of a penetrating eye into the drifts of every neighbouring nation, and an undiscourageable heart for the security and interest of his own; we shall find them still more numerous. And these, as they most of them have a special regard to Spain, might proceed from the perfect knowledge he had of that kingdom and its tyrannical practices. One instance hereof we have in that discourse of The Spaniards Cruelties to the English in Havanna; which is ascrib'd to Sir Walter Ralegh, with other tracts, in a volume among the manuscripts of a late person of honour. <sup>c</sup> His many other observations of this kind might well produce his Consultation about the Peace with Spain, and our protecting the Netherlands, of which some account has been before given; <sup>d</sup> as also that other treatise, How War may be made with Spain and the Indies, mention'd in the same place. Directions for such an enterprize may be easily presumed to have been effectually enough given by

<sup>b</sup> This also had the same famous editor, being first publish'd with the title of The Cabinet-Council, containing the chief Arts of Empire, and Mysteries of State discabinated, &c. By the ever-renowned Knight Sir Walter Ralegh: publish'd by John Milton, Esq; 8vo. 1658, who prefixed this motto, Quis Martem tunica testum, Adamantina digne scripsit? The editor's opinion of this book and its author, he farther offers to the reader in these words, "Having had the MS. of this treatise written by Sir Walter Ralegh many years in my hands, and finding it lately by chance among other books and papers; upon reading thereof, I thought it a kind of injury to withhold longer the work of so eminent an author from the publick; it being both answerable in stile to other works of his already extant, as far as the subject would permit, and given me for a true copy by a learned man at his death, who had collected several such pieces John Milton." In the second edition it was titled, The Arts of Empire, and Mysteries of State discabinated, &c. 8vo. Lond. 1692; containing 238 pages, and beginning with

<sup>c</sup> See a Catalogue of the Library of a Person of Honour, &c. with near a thousand choice manuscripts relating to the state of England and Ireland, 4to. without date, p. 10. This library was sold, in the former part of the late queen's reign, by Christopher Bateman, a noted bookseller, who once told me to whom those manuscripts did belong; and if my memory fails not, they were a part of Henry earl of Clarendon's vast collections, yet a different part, I think, from that which is in the possession of his grace the Duke of Candor.

<sup>d</sup> See before in these sheets, fol. 150, where there is a manuscript of this Consultation quoted; which in some places is more perfect than the printed copy, and is the property of the reverend and learned Mr. Harbin. It begins thus: May it please your majesty: It belongs not to me to judge whether the king of Spain hath done wrong to the Netherlands, or the Netherlands have fail'd in allegiance towards the king, &c. 47 pages in the printed copy, publish'd by Philip Ralegh, as was before observ'd, 8vo. 1702. That manuscript has, annexed to it, the Determinations of the Council of War in 1587, before mention'd fol. 39. A manuscript also of the said Consultation, there was in the library of the earl of Arundel; another in the Harleian library; another in that of Dr. John Mort, late bishop of Ely; another in Sir Hans Sluys's, &c. &c.

the same hand that was also author of The present State of Spain, with a most accurate Account of his Catholick Majesty's Power and Riches: also the Names and Worth of the most considerable Persons in that Kingdom: a manuscript which I have not hitherto been so successful as to meet with. <sup>a</sup> Yet take it to be a different performance from that also written by our author, and entitled, The present State of Things, as they now stand between the three Kingdoms, France, England, and Spain; whereof there is a copy in being. <sup>b</sup> Further, it was this intimate knowledge he had in the state of all the European princes, which so well qualified him to give the approved advice he did in those two Discourses he wrote upon The Match propounded by the Savoyan, between the lady Elizabeth and the prince of Piedmont: And that between prince Henry of England, and a daughter of Savoy, of which we have several manuscript copies, and, as I have heard, the original also extant. <sup>c</sup> The same knowledge likewise, enabled him so dexterously to eviscerate the corrupt doctrines, and pernicious designs of the papists, in his Dialogue between a Jesuite and a Recusant; shewing how dangerous their Principles are to Christian Princes. <sup>d</sup> Another excellent tract we have of his in this way of writing is, his Dialogue between a Counsellor of <sup>a</sup> Anthony Wood tells us, this treatise, said to have been written by our author Sir Walter, is a MS. going about from hand to hand; and before him, Shirley, in his Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, calls it an excellent manuscript.

<sup>c</sup> The first of these discourses by Sir Walter Raleigh on the Marriage of the Princess Elizabeth begins thus: To obey the commandments of my lord the prince, I have sent you my opinion of the match lately desired by the duke of Savoy, &c. It makes about five sheets and half a page in the MS. before me, which seems to have been a good old copy taken soon after this discourse was first composed by our author; tho' four of the leaves towards the beginning are now much damag'd. Join'd to this, is the second Discourse, touching a Marriage between Prince Henry and a Daughter of Savoy; beginning with these words, There is no body that persuades our prince to match with Savoy for any love to the person of the duke, nor, as I hope, for his religion, &c. and this, in the same hand, is about six sheets in length. They were both originally written in the ninth year of king James's reign; or anno Dom. 1611, as was before observ'd; and this copy of these discourses, was by the interest of a noble personage procured, for this use, from the collections of that worthy divine lately in these notes mention'd. There is a copy of this last Discourse on the Prince's Marriage among the MS. collections of Sir Hans Sloane; mark'd in his library, B. 612; and another in the library of Trinity college in Dublin. In the Cottonian library also, there is a copy of this last discourse, but I think not of the other. It was once a fair one, but scarcely so ancient as that above us'd, and by mistake, the amanuensis had ascrib'd it to Sir A. Gorges; for this name is struck out and Sir Walter Raleigh's inserted in the same hand. By another mistake, of the binder, there is but half of this tract to be found in one volume, the remainder being bound in that mark'd with the preceding number. See the said volumes under the bust of Vitellius, C. N<sup>o</sup>. 17 and 16. But the greatest mistake of all was, the suffering of women-servants to get up their linnen in rooms underneath those where the Royal library, with this of Sir Robert Cotton, were lately kept at Ashburnham-house, in Westminster; for thereby, a mantle-tree taking fire, (which lay across a stove-grate) on the 23d of October, 1731, it made such destruction among the said manuscripts, that of nine hundred forty-eight volumes, whereof the Cottonian library consisted, seven hundred forty-six only escaped the flames; a hundred fourteen being quite lost or intirely spoil'd, and ninety-eight damaged: so that this library now contains eight hundred forty-four volumes, intire and defective; as may be gather'd from Mr. Whiston's Narrative of the said Fire; printed in A Report from the Committee appointed to view the Cottonian Library, and the other publick Records of this Kingdom. Published by Order of the House of Commons, Fol. 1732. Now among those damaged volumes, were the two above mention'd, which contain this Discourse of Sir Walter Raleigh's, and which I have observed to be so burnt all about the margins, even into the writing, that I question if the sense, especially at the top of the leaves, can from thence be, every where, perfectly recover'd. The best is, that we may hope in the truth of an information I have received from a gentleman who has great intelligence, as well as great collections of such like curiosities, that Sir Walter Raleigh's original MS. of one, or both these Discourses, is preserved in the noble family of the Paulets; tho' I have not yet had opportunity of requesting a sight, whereby to satisfy myself and others in the certainty thereof.

<sup>d</sup> This Dialogue (as has been before said) was first publish'd by Philip Raleigh, Esq; among the Genuine Remains, at the end of an Abridgment of his grand-father's History of the World, 8vo. 1700, &c. where it makes 43 pages, and begins thus: My most reverend father, you are well returned into England, &c. The conference herein is held, plainly, by two real persons, as may be gather'd from the historical particulars our author makes them deliver in some places of themselves; and in many places there are observations, almost verbatim, the same with several in others of Raleigh's writings. As the defeat of the Hugonots at the battle of Moncouter: The destruction of several millions of people in Hispaniola: The Spaniards never performing any enterprize against our nation by sea or land. Our driving away the invincible armada with squibs; arming all nations of Europe against ourselves, by the transportation of our iron ordnance; and, not to instance any further, his argument proving that, he who commands the sea may command the world, in the 60th page of these Genuine Remains, compared only with the 9th page of his Discourse of Shipping in the same collection, may prove sufficiently they were both written by one hand. The time when this Dialogue was written, might also be found in it; for it was, both after Sir George Somers's death, and the publication of Anticaton, a treatise against the Declaratory Letter, written to the queen regent of France, by Peter Coton, confessor to king Henry IV; in which letter he having apologiz'd for, or too gently and tardily reprov'd the king-killing doctrine of Mariana and other Jesuites, the said Anticaton was publish'd in French, and translated into English 4to. 1611, to prove them the authors of that execrable parricide the foregoing year on the said French king, by the bloody hand of Ravillac. Among the holy champions mention'd in this pamphlet, for the said doctrine of regicide, I find Andreas Eudæmon Johannes Cydonius, as he wrote himself in his books: but he was a French Jesuite, and his true name Jean l'Heureux. This father John publish'd in Latin, that same year the said king of France was stab'd to death in his coach, an Apology for father Garnet, and the powder-plotters, 8vo. Col. Agrip. 1610. And this was answered by the learned Dr. Robert Abbot, three years after in his Antilogia. But as there is a part in the said Apology, which touches upon Sir Walter Raleigh, he has taken care to answer that himself: for that Jesuite writing himself of Cydon, a town in Crete, Raleigh takes occasion, where he is giving the known character of the Cretans, not to except this Eudæmon Jack Andrew, as one of them, "Who, (continues our author) "in one of his late shameless libels, wherein he traduces "our king, religion, and country, with all the good "and worthy men of whom he could learn the names, "has, by inserting my name, twice belied me, in calling "me a puritan, and one that has been dangerous to my "sovereign. It is an honour to be ill spoken of by so "diligent a supporter of treason, and architect of lies; "in regard whereof I may not deny him the commendation of Creticism, no less voluminous, than he in "multiplicity of names, is beyond any Cretans, in elder "times; who were always liars, evil beasts, and slow "bellies." History of the World, lib. 5. cap. 5. sect. 2.

State, and a Justice of Peace, better known in the printed copies, by the title of his Prerogative of Parliaments; dedicated with a true and generous spirit of wisdom and loyalty to king James.<sup>a</sup> These two dialogues will give a perfect taste of our author's manner in these his lesser compositions, and are answerable to the character before deliver'd of his Consultation about the Peace, abovemention'd. The last tract we have to speak of under this partition, except perhaps a short unprinted Discourse of the Words Law and Right also ascribed to him, and to be found in the Ashmolean library, is entitled, Observations touching Trade and Commerce with the Hollander, and other Nations, as it was presented to King James; wherein is prov'd, that our Sea and Land Commodities serve to enrich and strengthen other Countries against our own. But as there are some reasons to doubt whether Sir Walter Raleigh was the author of this treatise, I need say no more of it in this place; yet shall throw them into a corner of the page,<sup>b</sup> where they may least interrupt the progressive view of his remaining writings.

These

<sup>a</sup> This excellent Dialogue is, by some describers of its title, from certain manuscript copies that were in the libraries of Sir William Glyme, Bart. and the late bishop More, said to have been written by our author in 1610. But this I take to be an error that may be rectified by the very first speech in the said Dialogue, which is as follows. "Now Sir, what think you of Mr. St. John's trial in the star-chamber? I know that the bruit ran, that he was hardly dealt withal, because he was imprison'd in the Tower; seeing his dissuasion from granting a benevolence to the king was warranted by law." Whoever knows any thing of the parliamentary proceedings of these times can tell, that this Mr. Oliver St. John (afterwards lord Grandison, and lieutenant of Ireland) was imprison'd in the star-chamber 5000 l. in April, and made his submission in May 1615 for opposing that benevolence, moved in the foregoing session of parliament, which was so abruptly dissolv'd. This is enough to prove the said Dialogue was not written before that year; and, as our author, in his dedication to the king, mentions himself to be still under restraint, this will prove it was written in that year. The beginning of his address to the said king is as follows, according to the most correct copies I have seen of it. "Most gracious Sovereign, Those who are suppress'd and helpless, are commonly silent; wishing that the common ill might, in all things, sort with their particular misfortunes: which disposition, as it is uncharitable in all men, so it would, in me, be more dog-like, than man-like, to bite the stone that struck me, to wit, the borrow'd authority of my sovereign, misinform'd, seeing their arms and hands that slung it, are, most of them, already rotten. For I must confess it ever, that they are debts and not discontentments, that your majesty hath laid upon me; the debts and obligations of a friendless adversity far more payable in all kinds than those of the prosperous. All which, nor the least of them, tho' I cannot discharge, I may yet endeavour it. And notwithstanding my restraint has retrenched all ways, as well the ways of labour and peril, as of all other employments, yet has it left with me my cogitations; than which I have nothing else to offer on the altar of my love. Of those, most gracious sovereign, I have used some part in the following dispute between a counsellor of state and justice of peace; the one dissuading, the other persuading the calling of a parliament. In all which, since the Norman conquest, at least so many as histories have gathered, I have in some things, in the following dialogue, presented your majesty with the contents and successes." Upon collating an old manuscript of this Dialogue in the Harleian library, with the common printed copies, the most material difference I observed was, that these in print sometimes confound the arguments of the two speakers together, or blend one with the other, by not regarding the proper divisions of the colloquy. Whether the fault of an ignorant transcriber, or of a careless compositor at the press of the first edition, I cannot say, but we are pretty sure it was not printed before the author's death. The earliest edition I have seen, seems to be the first (however Anthony Wood mentions one to have been printed seven years before it) for it runs thus: The Prerogative of Parliaments in England, proved in a Dialogue pro et contra between a Counsellor of State and a Justice of Peace. Written by the worthy, much lacked and lamented Sir Walter Raleigh, Knt. deceas'd: Dedicated to the King's Majesty and to the House of Parliament now assembled; preserved, to be now happily, in these distracted times, published: printed at Middelburge, 4to. 1628. I think it was also reprinted in the same size in 1642. In 1651 it was printed in 12mo. and remitted into the collection call'd his Remains; so has descended in the several editions thereof, and in the last makes about 4 sheets and a quarter. If this piece, or any other of Sir Walter Raleigh's writing, were to need a character, we might refer to that short, but shining one, which may serve for one and all, in bishop Nicholson's English Historical Library, where he says, "Sir Walter Raleigh has written, as he used to do upon all other subjects, most judiciously and accurately upon the prerogatives of our parliaments;" so refers to Sir Henry Spelman's Glossary, p. 451. From the noble endeavours to restrain all violent courses of administration, to heal the wounds of government, to cultivate a mutual harmony between prince and people, and detect the misapplications of his revenue by a few greedy and deceitful courtiers, wherewith this and other like writings of our author abound; we may account for the readiness which has been shewn so universally, even down to our times, of assuming the name of Sir Walter Raleigh when any character of a patriot, or person of a publick spirit was to be reviv'd or personated by our political writers for reforming erroneous measures in the state, or recommending advantageous ones to it. To this purpose we meet with him, in Andrew Marvell's poems, in Tom Brown's Belgic Hero; and his name subscrib'd to several Epistolary Essays in pamphlets, news-papers, and other like occasional writings, that animadvert upon the occurrences of the times. Not that his real character is perhaps always justly maintain'd, or he made to espouse the party he would really have sided with; for his name has been used to patronise the principles of opposite parties, and we sometimes meet with one rebuking the other, for making so free with such an honourable shelter. Thus among some Poems on Affairs of State, collected from the daily, evening and weekly papers, &c. 8vo. 1733, there is one, page 9, To a Person who subscribes his Writings with the Name of RALEIGH. Wherein that part which concerns our subject is as follows.

Hear you, who, fearless of the brand of shame,
Subscribe your treasons with a Raleigh's name:
He rose a blessing to Eliza's reign,
And spread her glory o'er the land and main;
O'er distant seas asserted England's sway,
And fought New Worlds beneath the burning day:
He toil'd unwearied for his Country's peace,
To make her honour and her wealth increase;
All mercenary views his soul despis'd,
He bravely practis'd what he first advis'd.
When his great Mistress from her throne retir'd,
With the same ardor which his youth inspir'd,
His part he acted on the world's great stage,
Nor droop'd beneath the weight of cares or age;
To the last hour was his allegiance try'd:
Loyal he prov'd to him by whose commands he dy'd.
Such Raleigh was—whose fame compar'd with thine,
Is such as Milton's when compar'd with mine.

<sup>b</sup> Roger Coke, Esq; in his Detection of the Court and State of England during the four last Reigns, printed 8vo. the third edition, 1697, speaking of Raleigh page 80, fixes these Observations on Trade and Commerce upon him in these words: "While he was thus confined, he was the first who made publick the growth by sea of the Dutch, and the riches they deriv'd from their fishing upon the coasts of England and Scotland, and the consequence which would necessarily follow, not only to the loss of the king's sovereignty of the British seas, but to the trade and navigation of England otherwise." After These we shall divide but into two parts, and then perhaps one of them may be best comprehended under the topic of Philosophy. This way seems to look, by its subject, that short Treatise Philosophical of the Soul ascrib'd to Sir Walter Ralegh, whereof there is a copy preserved among the Asbmo-lean manuscripts. It was never publish'd, I think, and I have not yet seen it; therefore can say no more, at present, of it. But we have in print, another treatise which may be admitted under this head, being built on the doctrine of Pyrrho the Greek philosopher, entitled, Sir Walter Ralegh's Sceptick or Speculations. This doctrine, shewing how much may be said for and against the same things; such an ingenious exemplification of it as this little tract contains, may, if discreetly used, prevent many rash, dogmatical determinations, and inure us to a wary or prudent suspense of judgment: for the sceptick, as our author describes him, does neither affirm nor deny any position, but doubts of it, and opposes reasons against that which is affirm'd or deny'd, to justify his not consenting; because he may report how things appear, but whether they are so he knows not. This little tract, as it is here handled, relates chiefly to our senses; a but another we have, upon a more dignified topic, as concerning our manners, or virtues and vices; therefore what might be more particularly subdivided under the distinction of moral philosophy; and it is call'd, Instructions to his Son, and Posterity. A treatise well becoming an author, who had seen the world in so many climates, and life in so many changes. It is written in a perspicuous style, with forcible arguments, and on the most practical subjects. These are interspersed with several memorable admonitions, the fruits of his particular experience therefore may claim a part in his personal history; and being apt to rivet in the mind, may prove of constant use and service; as touching upon the most incidental engagements in life. Thus, in his first chapter upon the choice of friends, he says: "Tho' I persuade thee to associate " with thy betters, or at least with thy peers; yet remember always, that thou venture not " thy estate with any of those great ones who shall attempt unlawful things; for such men

" labour for themselves, and not for thee; thou shalt be sure to impart with them in the " danger, but not in the honour; and to venture a sure estate at present, in hopes of a better
" in future, is mere madness: besides, great men forget such as have done them service when " they have obtained what they would, and will rather hate thee for saying, thou hast been a

" After that, one Tobias Gentleman set forth another " treatise of this nature, and how this fishery might be " carried on from the ports of England; and dedicated
" it to the king. But the king, wholly giving himself " up to pleasure, neither minded one, nor regarded the " other." That Gentleman was a fisherman, or other like " sea-faring man, and I have seen his treatise; but publish" ed long before this, I think, was, which that historian
" ascribes thus to Sir Walter Ralegh. The first edition of " these Observations I could ever meet with in print, " is in 12mo. 1653, and it was bound up with the second " edition of Ralegh's Remains, 1656. Its anonymous pub" lisher appears to be the bookseller; who had no other " authority for appropriating it to Sir Walter Ralegh, but " the opinion of a person who recommended it to him as a " genuine piece of his writing. 'Tis true, our author has " touch'd, after a different manner, upon the topick, in " some of his tracts, and particularly at the end of his Dis" course of Shipping; where he laments " That strangers " should be permitted to eat us out, by exporting and " importing both our own commodities, and those of fo" reign nations." But I think no treatise of his will be " found that descends so much into minute examples, cal" culations, &c. However, not to except at this, because " a treatise upon trade may require observations suitable to " the subject, it does not appear probable that the author " of these Observations, whose project was, as he tells us,
" To erect twenty huffs in some sea-port town, so by " degrees to extend a thousand or two over the nation;
" who was one that had traced this business, made his " endeavours known not only to the king, but his no" blemen, merchants and others, who had made him
" subscriptions to disburse large sums of money for building " up this great and rich sea-city;" should be a prisoner all " this while in the Tower of London. No, this projector, " further proposing to constitute a state merchant, for these " purposes; and praying, in the conclusion, that the king " would give him leave to nominate the commissioners for " conferring upon, and making report thereof to his ma" jesty, seems to have been some manufacturing or mercan" tile man, one ambitious of that office himself, and con" sequently none of Sir Walter Ralegh. But if from the " subject before us, we bend our consideration to the time
" when this tract was written, we shall find further objection against entitling our author to it. For the very first words " of the dedication are, " According to my duty, I am " embolden'd to put your majesty in mind, that, about " fourteen or fifteen years past, I presented you a book

" of such extraordinary importance for honour and pro" fit of your majesty and posterity, and doubting it has " been laid aside, &c. I am encouraged to present you " with one more, &c." Now if we allow the first book
" to have been presented in the very first year of the king's " being in England, then this second must have been pre" sented in 1617 or 1618, when Sir Walter Ralegh was " out of England, or his thoughts far differently engag'd.
" But the greatest objection of all is, that there are several " manuscripts of this treatise in the libraries of our nobility
" and gentry (more ancient than the earliest edition in print)
" which, as I have observ'd, do all entitle it to one John
" Keymer, possibly the merchant or vintner of that name,
" whom Ralegh many years before had licensed to retail " wine in Cambridge, as is related in the foregoing part of " this life. With one of these manuscripts (the most ancient
" I have seen) among the collections of the late Mr. *Gran-
" ger*, there was another, written also in the same little neat
" old hand, ascribed to the same Keymer, and which I take
" to be that first mention'd in his dedication last quoted;
" and also to agree in its contents with John Keymer's Ob" servations made upon the Dutch Fishery, about the year
" 1601. Demonstrating there is more wealth raised out of " herrings and other fish in his majesty's seas and the neigh" bouring nations in one year, than the king of Spain bath from
" the Indies in four: And that there were twenty thousand
" ships and other vessels, and about four hundred thousand " people then set on work by sea and land, and maintained
" only by fishing upon the coasts of England, Scotland, and " Ireland. Printed 8vo. London. (from the original manuscript) " for Sir Edward Ford, in the year 1664. Whoever has " read these two pieces, will allow that one hand writ
" them.

" Of this Sceptick I remember not to have met with " any copy in manuscript, nor any edition more ancient " than that in the first collection of our author's Remains,
" 12mo. 1651: so has been reprinted in all the succeeding " editions thereof. 'Tis about 12 pages in the last and " largest edition.

“ means of their advancement, than acknowledge it. I could give thee a thousand examples ;
 “ I myself know it, and have tasted it in all the course of my life.” From his next chapter, on the choice of a wife, we have before given extracts in this work. His third, against flatterers, ends with this reflection: “ Thou may’st be sure, that he, who in private will tell thee of “ thy faults, is thy friend ; for he adventures thy mislike, and hazards thy hatred : few can “ endure it, every man for the most part delighting in self-praise ; one of the most universal “ follies which bewitches mankind.” From the fourth chapter on private quarrels we have already given a taste ; and here, the chief caution he further urges to prevent the inconveniencies thereof, is ever to beware of unadvised speech. “ He that cannot refrain from much speaking, “ says he, is like a city without walls.” And a little further, “ In all that ever I observed “ in the course of worldly things, I ever found, that mens fortunes are oftner made by their “ tongues than by their virtues, and more mens fortunes overtbrowen thereby also, than by their “ vices.” In the fifth chapter, among the rules recommended to preserve an estate, the most pressing is against suretiship ; advising rather to give a part of what a man has, than live in continual apprehension of losing both it and his friend. “ If thou art bound, says he, for a stranger, thou art a “ fool ; if for a merchant, thou puttest thy estate to learn to swim ; if for a churchman, he has no “ inheritance ; if for a lawyer, he will find an evasion by a syllable or a word to abuse thee ; if
 “ for a poor man, thou must pay it thyself ; if for a rich one, he needs it not : therefore from “ suretiship as from a man-slayer or enchanter, bless thyself ; for the best profit and return will “ be this, that if thou force him for whom thou art bound, to pay it himself, he will become “ thy enemy ; if thou shalt use to pay it thyself, thou wilt be a beggar : and believe thy father
 “ in this, and print it in thy thoughts ; that whatever virtue thou hast, be it never so manifold,
 “ if thou be poor withal, thou and thy qualities shall be despised.” In the sixth chapter, upon servants, he has this advice : “ If thou trust any servant with thy purse, be sure thou take his “ accompt e’er thou sleep ; for if thou put it off, thou wilt then, afterwards, for tediousness “ neglect it ; I myself have thereby lost more than I am worth. Whatever thy servant gains “ thereby, he will never thank thee, but laugh thy simplicity to scorn ; besides, ’tis the way
 “ to make thy servants thieves, who else would be honest.” The seventh chapter is only a word or two against exceeding in the bravery of gay garments, “ as what will soon wear out “ of fashion, when money in the purse will always be in fashion.” The eighth is upon riches (and as it seems by the beginning, should follow the fifth) Herein exhorting against the attainment of them by base or evil means, he charges his son, as, never to destroy any man for his wealth, so, by no means further to impoverish the poor ; but above all things, to exercise compassion towards them, as the best way to prosperity and peace of mind. “ Use, says he,
 “ thy poor neighbours and tenants well ; pine not them and their children, to add superfluity
 “ and needless expences to thyself. He that has pity on another man’s sorrow, shall be free “ from it himself ; he that delights in, and scorns the misery of another, shall, one time or “ other, fall into it himself.” The ninth is against the inconveniencies of delighting in wine, as being the greatest enemy to health, trust, honour and preferment ; and the last chapter begins thus : “ Now for the world, I know it too well, to persuade thee to dive into the practices “ thereof ; rather stand upon thy own guard against all that tempt thee thereunto, or may “ practise upon thee in thy conscience, thy reputation, or thy purse ; resolve that no man is wise
 “ or safe, but he that is honest.” So concludes with advising him to make God his director in all his actions.

With these Instructions to his Son, which have, I think, been oftner printed <sup>a</sup> than most other of our author’s lesser pieces ; there is usually join’d, in all the editions I have seen, The dutiful Advice of a loving Son to his aged Father. ’Tis a religious and rhetorical exhortation to prepare for his latter end ; written in a general manner, but how probably by our author, or by either of his sons, it is left to the critical and discerning reader. <sup>b</sup> All the works I have met with

<sup>a</sup> Four editions of this tract, call’d, Instructions to his Son, were publish’d before the first collection was made of Raleigh’s Remains. The earliest edition of it I have met with, was printed 12mo. 1632, in a larger character than we have it in the modern editions. The fifth edition (and in the title to be) corrected and enlarged according to the author’s own copy, is printed in the said collection of his Remains, 12mo. 1651, and has been reprinted five or six times at least since with those Remains, that is, in 1656, 1660, 1664, 1675, 1679, &c. and 1726. It fills, in this last edition (which has a letter or two of our author’s more than the others) about 20 pages. And begins thus : There is nothing more becoming any wise man than to make choice of friends, for by them thou shalt be judged what thou art. We are informed there is a MS. of Sir Walter Raleigh to his son, which I take to be these Instructions, in the library at Grays Inn. Vol. Catalogi librorum manuscriptorum Angliæ et Hiberniæ. Fol. Oxon. 1697. tom. 2. part 1. page 255.

<sup>b</sup> This Dutiful Advice of a loving Son to his aged Father was printed also in 1632, with those Instructions, and with them admitted into Raleigh’s Remains, 12mo. 1651. From which time it has been reprinted in the succeeding editions thereof, and makes about a dozen pages. Beginning thus : Sir, I humbly beseech you, both in respect to the honour of God, &c.

further ascribed to Sir Walter Ralegh, bearing any affinity with this class, are two manuscripts, which might be distinguished under the branch of Natural Philosophy. The first is his treatise Of Mines, and the Trial of Minerals; a subject on which he very probably might write, both from his own observations in the West Indies, and those engagements he might also have in his native county of Devon, with his brother Sir Adrian Gilbert, who first, in queen Elizabeth's reign, begun to work the long-neglected mines in Comb-Martin (whence king Edward III. had supply'd his wars against France) and was followed by Sir Beavis Bulmer, who from those mines recover'd a great quantity of silver, out of which, he caus'd two massy goblets to be made; one whereof was presented to the earl of Bath; and the other, weighing one hundred thirty-seven ounces, to the lord mayor of London in the 35th of the queen's reign. <sup>a</sup> So that what Cicero says to his friend of this island, that it yielded not a drachm of that metal, was false in Ralegh's time, and what he could not be sure was true in his own. <sup>b</sup> But whether the said treatise is so particular as to mention any thing of this I know not, having never seen it. <sup>c</sup> The second manuscript is Sir Walter Ralegh's Collection of Chymical and Medicinal Receipts for fixing Mercury, preparing Antimony, and for the Cure of several diseases. <sup>d</sup> His application to studies of this kind, may perhaps be somewhat accountable from the patronage, which, as in a note before cited, it appears he had shewn to John Hester, the famous chymist, with the conversation there might probably pass between them, and the knowledge he had learn'd from the Guianians of curing all manner of poisons, &c. 'Tis apparent, that he bestow'd some portion of his time upon the use of lembicks and crucibles while he was in the Tower, and seems to have had a kind of laboratory there for his said operations. A view of him in this light will explain the expression in a character of him given by Dr. Joseph Hall, the venerable bishop of Norwich (whom Sir H. Wotton calls the English Seneca) where he speaks (among other things, which will be hereafter observ'd) of Sir Walter Ralegh's philosophical experiments in the Tower. And other authors might be produced, who, in their character of him, also refer to his profound knowledge in the mysteries of nature, or his investigations thereof, through the animal, vegetable, and mineral world, for the benefit of his countrymen, notwithstanding some memorable attempts to advance their prosperity in the political world, had met with much discouragement: as if, tho' he could not absolutely recover them from some indispositions or corruptions of the mind, he was hereby resolv'd to try how serviceable and successful he could be against the maladies of their body.

How elaborately soever many of these pieces are allowed by others to have been written, our author look'd upon them but as little excursions, or fallies, as he calls them, from his grand labour, I mean that Ocean of History, wherein he has out-done all that went before him, and <sup>Historical</sup> given such lights to futurity as must ever be grateful. A voyage, which, "If begun even in " the dawn of his day, when the light of knowledge first broke out upon his younger years,
" and before any wound received, either from fortune or time, he might yet well have doubted
" (as he observes himself) that the darkness of age and death would have overtaken him long " before the performance." <sup>e</sup> But being undertaken, as it was, in the evening of a tempestuous life, a life so far run out in travels and considerations of such opposite nature; for one under the soul-piercing privations of honour, fortune, freedom! One buried alive! to attempt such a universal revival of the dead! And, while his body, under all those pressures, was so long incarcerated, for his brain to be deliver'd of that Minerva, as one calls it, <sup>f</sup> his HISTORY OF THE WORLD! is an example, that might puzzle such an Historian even as Ralegh himself to parallel. For, beginning at the creation, he has given us the flower of recorded story down to the end of the second Macedonian war. Thus having reviewed the three first monarchies of the world, he leaves Rome in the fourth, triumphant, about a century and a half before the birth of Christ, comprehending a period of near four thousand years. This work was divided by our author into five books, who annexed to it a very copious and useful chronological table; and it was,

<sup>d</sup> This Collection of Chymical and Medicinal Receipts—as was before noted, is an original, in the library of Sir Thom. Sloane. It contains about 70 leaves in 4to. and in the 63d leaf, as was also observ'd, Sir Walter Ralegh has written Our Great Cordial, with a line under it, which he usually drew under his own name. The list of ingredients which follows, may, I think, be discerned through the scratches made by some hand or other to obliterate it: and may, perhaps, be the most genuine Recipe of that Great Cordial, extant in the world, notwithstanding it is supposed our author had written it more completely in the ensuing leaf which is torn out. For as to the Recipe in le Febvre's Discourse upon this Cordial, I have, upon a more diligent examination of that discourse, found, that he acknowledges at least a dozen more additions to Sir Walter's Recipe than is before taken notice of.

with the further decorations of maps, tables of genealogy, &c. publish'd in the month of April, just before the meeting of the parliament, <sup>a</sup> in a large volume folio, 1614. The approbation it has met with since the author's death has been so universal, that if they are different editions of the book to which we may see different dates printed, we may venture to say, no work, of any author in England, has been so often reprinted that is of equal size and antiquity. <sup>b</sup> The several characters and commendations which have been bestow'd on this history as well by miscellaneous writers, who have frequently quoted it with great deference and respect, as by historians and criticks who have closely traced and thoroughly examin'd it; and as well in verse, as prose; would be too numerous to be here inserted, could they be recover'd. To provide therefore as well against the ignorance as the satiety of those readers who have not met with them, a few are presented in the annotation here directed to. <sup>c</sup> He took no ordinary care to deserve

<sup>b</sup> Besides this first edition in 1614, printed by W. Stansby for W. Burre, I have seen copies by the same printer bearing date 1617. This edition, I think, has the picture of our author, grav'd by S. Pasi, and the frontispiece by Ren. Elfrack. Another is dated 1628; and perhaps there is one between those. Another in 1634; another 1652; another in 1656, printed by Robert White, &c. another in 1661, printed for Robert White, &c. Anthony Wood mentions one in 1666, in which edition, or perhaps in one or two before it, it was first printed in double columns. Another (now before me) printed for George Dawkes 1671; another in 1678; and another in 1687. After which, there was none, I think, till this last 1735.

<sup>c</sup> This may not perhaps be better introduced than in the reflection of bishop Hall, lately abovemention'd, who, in his ingenious book of Consolations, has these words, "A wise man, as Laurentius the presbyter observed well, does much in solitude. So may'st thou employ the hours of thy close retiredness, and bless God for so happy an opportunity. How memorable an instance has our age afforded us of an eminent person to whose imprisonment we are all obliged, besides many philosophical experiments, for that noble HISTORY of the WORLD now in our hands? The Court had his youthful and freer years, and the Tower his latter age; the Tower reformed the Courtier in him, and produced those worthy monuments of art and industry, which we should have in vain expected from his freedom and jollity. It is observed, that shining wood, when it is kept within doors, loses its light: it is otherwise with this, and many other active wits, which had never shin'd so much, if not for closeness." Thus in a treatise call'd, Balm of Gilead; or, Comforts for the Distress'd, both moral and divine, by Dr. Joseph Hall, bishop of Norwich, 12mo. 1652; afterwards reprinted under the title of The Art of Patience, &c. 8vo. 1684, and by a base plagiarism, ascribed to the author of The whole Duty of Man, who wanted not the reputation of this book; tho' he, from whom it is stol'n, had enough to spare. In the Familiar Letters of James Howell, Esq; speaking of this rare and renowned knight, he says, "His fame shall contend in longevity with this island itself, yea with that great World which he Historifies so gallantly." In another well-known book of his, call'd Dodona's Grove; or, The Vocal Forest, discoursing of Raleigh, and describing him to have been, "A cavalier of a spacious understanding and of no vulgar reach in policy; scientific, and full of abstruse notions;" he adds, "That tho' his body was under restraint, and coffin'd up so many years, yet he never travers'd more countries than then; for his brain ran over all the World, as appears by that famous Monument he transmitted to posterity and hung up in the Temple of Fame, while he was as it were buried alive." But in the Life of the lord Stafford, written by Anthony Stafford, Esq; 4to. 1640, this author goes so far as to say, "That if Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World had been written in the Indian tongue, we should not have scrupled or avoided the pains of learning that language, only to read it. If we consult what character the historians give it, we may find many of them who never name it without some epithet or sentence in its praise. Thus Dr. Heylin in one place call it an excellent history; in another, the first or chief of histories. And thus in the preface of Dr. William Howell's Universal History, who must have had continual occasions of inspecting our author's, 'tis said, 'That Sir Walter Raleigh is never to be mention'd without honour. Shidley, in his Life of our author, gives it as his judgment of his History, "That for the exactness of its chronology, curiousest of its contexture, and learning of all sorts, it seems to be the work of an age." And a little further, "That a man, who had been the greatest part of his life taken up in action, should write so judiciously, so critically, of times and actions, is as great a wonder as the book itself; and it still remains in doubt, whether the age he liv'd in was more oblig'd to his pen or his sword, the one being busy in conquering the new, the other in so bravely describing the old world." And Mr. Echard, in the preface of his Roman History, admires that part of Raleigh's History which treats of the Roman story, "Especially the last hundred years, which, says he, are written with very much spirit and judgment, and all of it with as much skill and clearness: yet that all before the first Punick war is not proportionably copious to the rest." But how duely it was consider'd by this particular historian, whether that was not a judicious disproportion in our general historian, may be left to the examination of others. If we search what the criticks have said of this History, we shall find their commendations exceed the rest. Among these we may mention Degory Whear, the first Camden-Professor of History at Oxford, who, speaking of such universal historians as are most worthy and before all others to be read; and having only named Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus and Polybius, he goes on thus: Hos autem sequi possunt nonnulli ex recentioribus: quos inter, principem locum obtinere meretur Gualterus Raulæus nostras, eques auratus, vir clari nominis, et ob singularem fortitudinem ac prudentiam, meliori fato dignus. Is universalem historiam ab initio mundi usque ad Macedonici imperii, sive tertiæ monarchiæ occasum, et probatissimis auctoribus coagmentavit; nostræ quidem gentis idioma vernaculo, sed accurato admodum judicio, methodo perspicuâ, stylo elegante ac virili. Methodus legendi historiarum, 8vo. Cantab. 1684. p. 28. To this we may join the character of Dr. Henry Felton in his Dissertation upon the Classics, where he says, "Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World is a work of so vast a compass, such endless variety, that no genius but one adventurous as his own, durst have undertaken that great design. I do not apprehend any great difficulty in collecting and common-placing an universal history from the whole body of historians; that is nothing but mechanick labour. But to digest the several authors in his mind; to take in all their majesty, strength and beauty; to raise the spirit of meaner historians, and to equal all the excellencies of the best; this is Sir Walter's peculiar praise. His style is the most perfect, the happiest, the most beautiful of the age he wrote in; majestick, clear and manly; and he appears every-where so superior rather than unequal to his subject, that the spirit of Rome and Athens seems to be breathed into his work."

Or if what the Poets have said upon this performance, may be more entertaining to the reader, some pains have been taken to do our author honour also by them. As to those copies of verses which were written upon this history in a fair MS. epitomy of it in 4to. which was among the collections of that remarkable virtuoso Thomas Britton, late of Clerkenwell, as we find in the printed catalogue of that part of his library which was sold towards the latter part of the late king William's reign; I never saw, nor knew where to recommend any one to the sight of them. But have, before me, a MS. collection of Orations and Poems, written mostly by a student of New-College in Oxford, about the middle of the last century (who was afterwards a person eminent in his profession) Among these, there is an elegy on his dear friend Mr. George Franklin; wherein, having deserve these encomiums; for besides his own learning, knowledge and judgment, which many would have thought sufficient for any undertaking, he with that caution, wherewith we have beheld so many others of his great enterprizes temper'd, would suffer no part of this history to pass his own hand, before some of the most able scholars, whom he assembled, it seems, for this purpose, had debated the parts he was most doubtful of, and they most conversant in, before him. Thus in the Mosaic and Oriental antiquities, or fainter and more remote footsteps of time, he would sometimes consult the learned Dr. Robert Burbill.<sup>a</sup> In all parts of chronology, geography, and other branches of mathematical science, he wanted not the opinions of the learned Harriot, and the earl of Northumberland's three Magi,<sup>b</sup> long his neighbours in the Tower; and wherever he scrupled any thing in the phrase or diction, he would hear the acute and ingenious Sir John Hoskyns, sometime also resident in these confines; who viewed and reviewed the said history, as we are told, before it went to the press, and whom Ben Johnson, proud of calling others his sons, could gratify that humour in calling father.<sup>c</sup> Thus having spared for no labour, and neglected no means to bring this work to the perfection wherein we behold it, 'tis no wonder that some scribbler or other should, upon finding it so universally read, endeavour to raise himself a little profit or credit from it, by pretending that the world needed an abridgment of its history,<sup>d</sup> as if that wherewith Sir Walter Raleigh has presented us, either is, or was intended for any thing more. But this more specious kind of detraction having elegantly describ'd his great proficiency in other sciences, the poet directs it as the highest compliment he could make to his perfection in this we are now speaking of, that

In UNIVERSAL HISTORY, 'twas clear,
He had approv'd himself Great RALEGH's heir.

But among S. Sheppard's Epigrams, written about the same time, and publish'd 8vo. 1651, there is, in the third book, one, On that incomparable Hero Sir Walter Raleigh; which speaks of him and his history in the following words.

Like the Athenians, when with furious ire,
Against learn'd Socrates they did conspire;
After his death, themselves were like to slay,
For sorrow they had made him so away;
And, having carv'd his statue out in brass,
Erected it within their market-place;
And to him offer'd myrrh and spicery,
Adoring him as if some deity;
So we, while thou on earth with us did'st live, Slighted thy worth; not having hearts to give Thee thanks and honour for that Gift of thine,
The lovely issue of thy brain divine;
But now thou art not with us, we look on Thy book, and wonder at Thee being gone.
Rest, sacred spirit, while thy work shall be Devoutly honour'd by posterity.

There is also in being, a picture of our author, drawn with a pen and ink, having an emblematical device with an epigram under it, which relate partly to his History of the World. That device, in an oval frame of laurel or bays, presents a globe supported by a sword, and a pen; the sword broken by a scepter in a hand on one side, and the Tower in prospect on the other: and these are the lines, as they are printed in Phoenix Britannicus, one word only restor'd, according to the author's original, of which I have obtain'd a sight.

O! had'st thou serv'd the Heroine all thy days;
Had heav'n from storms of envy screen'd thy bays;
Had'st thou still flourish'd in a warlike reign;
Thy sword had made a conquest like thy pen!
But nought to such untimely fate could bring
The valiant subject, but a tim'rous king.

But that which of late years did much revive the public regard to this history was, the ingenious Dr. George Sewall's Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh, publish'd 8vo. 1719, and the much-admired character he has therein given of it. Considering under what disadvantages that dramatic performance appear'd, as written by a poet who had no practice or fame in this kind of writing; one insufficiently read in the personal story of his hero, to form that plot, and enliven it with those characters and incidents whereof it was capable; besides, acted at the New- Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, which then had less the favour of the town, especially for tragedy; and when another new play was at the same time acting at the Old House in Drury Lane. Considering all this, and, notwithstanding, how many nights this tragedy successively drew a noble and numerous audience, and how many editions of the copy soon passed the press; we may perceive, not only, what general and grateful respect still survives towards the particular memory of this famous man, but also how inclinable we are to clear ourselves of the imputation many times thrown upon us of alienating our encomiums, and transferring the honours which are due to the worthies of our own island, upon examples out of heathen or foreign histories, which because less affecting to our passions, and less applicable to our instruction, are less meritorious of such celebration. In the last act of this tragedy, where the poet brings in his hero deliberating or reflecting upon this capacious work, his History of the World lying on a table before him; the sentiments are so well assembled, so noble and natural, that it has been doubted, whether there was so much of fiction in the soliloquy, at least the votive part of it, as truth: But it is as follows.

Now my long toil is done, my soul at ease Views her past travels through the various heap
Of truth and fable. All that measur'd time Records of nations, governments and laws,
Of heroes, conquerors and purpled kings,
Lye here compris'd. O may the toilsome task
Answer the labourer's care with due returns!
May men grow wiser by their father's follies,
Or learn to emulate the virtuous dead!
And thou, my country, nearest to my heart,
Dear land of liberty and heavenly truth,
As thou survey'st the various models here
Of earthly power, their rise and infant state,
Their progress and their period; mark the flaws
Of every frame, and value much thy own:
Secure, while monarchy still bears the sway,
And joyful subjects pay a free obedience.

<sup>d</sup> The first attempt we have of this kind was by Alexander Ross, a Scotch divine, and schoolmaster at Southampton, in a book call'd, The Marrow of History; being an Epitome of Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World, 12mo. 1652, &c. certainly a most unconnected, enervating, and injudicious performance. His fallacious argument for this unacceptable trouble "of a dwarf seeing further upon a giant's shoulders than the giant himself" may be his case in the stature of his wit, but not the advantage of his prospect. And there is as much reason for clipping of sterling money as such mens writings. 'Tis true, Sir Walter Raleigh has made some digressions in his history, but they are the digressions of Sir Walter Raleigh; by which the life, spirit, air and complexion of the author are known; and above all, the great design of this work, those examples and those documents wherewith he most strenuously endeavour'd to season that hopeful prince's mind for whom it was written. Therefore hath made apology sufficient for the same, where he says, "That seemg we digress in the ways of our lives, and that the life of man is nothing else but digression, I may the better be excus'd in writing their lives and actions." And indeed, men of such eminency, erudition and experience, detracting meeting with no countenance, the author of it threw out another, of Animadversions upon this history; but as insignificant and no less disregarded than the other, being agreeable to that unhappy spirit of contradiction which ever harass'd him to oppose the greatest writers in his time.<sup>a</sup>

But that which is more considerable concerning this history is, whether our author ever continued it down to his own times; and whether, on some pretence that this first part did not meet with encouragement, he ever destroy'd the said continuation himself, as we have it in the mouths of every-body when they speak of him, but in the belief of no-body who knows any thing of his story or his character. All that he says himself, in the least glancing this way, is first in his preface, "That he propos'd to confine his discourse with this our renowned isle of Great-Britain." And "That he forbears to promise a second or third volume, which he intends if the first receives grace and good acceptance, for that which is already done may be thought enough and too much." Lastly, in the conclusion of the history he says, "Whereas this book by the title calls itself The first Part of the General History of the World, implying a second and third volume, which I also intended and have been out; besides many discouragements persuading my silence, it has pleased God to take that glorious prince out of the world to whom they were directed; whose unspeakable and never-enough lamented loss has taught me to say with Job, Versa est in luctum cithera mea, et organum meum in vocem flentium." From hence it seems plain enough, that our author had only some plan, or perhaps a few rough draughts of some succeeding parts of the history at this time drawn up, and that he was discouraged from making any further progress in them. Allowing his mind might change, and that there was time enough to finish the remaining volumes between this year, and that of his death, which is scarcely allowable; yet as we know how most of that time was employ'd by him, it will admit of no room for any such performance. For in 1615, the year which followed that wherein he publish'd his history, two at least of his most elaborate tracts beforemention'd were written. The same year he was also busy, as we shall find, in writing letters and making other interest for his releasement, which he obtain'd before it was quite expir'd. After this, it will no less appear, that he made himself too eminently the subject of rience, may well be trusted with such liberties, and thanked for taking them. But tho' when such prove wandering guides, it is more to our instruction than if they kept the straight and beaten road; yet they may be no patterns, in this particular, for writers of a private and inferior character. Another Abridgment we have of this history, in 8vo. 1700, &c. the author of it unknown; but the preface is written by Mr. Echard, who says, "The great knowledge and learning, the accurate skill in penetration, the sublime wisdom and piety, together with the curious remarks and observations, which so signally appear in Sir Walter Raleigh's History, have sufficiently recommended it to the judicious part of the world: yet that his too frequent and long digressions and observations, tho' several of them very fine and ingenious, are, too many, foreign to his subject: and yet that his moral and religious reflections, tho' sometimes long, are generally too excellent to need a vindication." But still "That these faults were the faults of the age, and have made many curious persons wish for an epitomy, &c." so Ross's attempt being executed with small skill and success, he recommends this. But those observations and digressions which these persons were so curious as to wish retrenched in this history, archbishop Usher, or the learned Dr. Bainbridge, had the curiosity to prefer, it seems, as matter of choicest note: as may appear by the excerptions made out of this history in a manuscript which has the writing of both those authors in it, and is preserved in the library of Trinity-College in Dublin. And such another preference, as the most delicate passages in this history, has lately been made by an ingenious hand in London, in a collection of many Divine, Moral, and Political Reflections out of it; which, if made with that choice, and brought into that order it is, capable of, will do our author more justice than all the epitomes of his history that the world shall be troubled with.

<sup>a</sup> Such as the lord Bacon and Sir Thomas Brown in philosophy; Fernelius and Dr. Harvey in physick; besides others. As for these Animadversions which the said Ross publish'd a few months before his death upon our author's History of the World, they are join'd to his Leviathan drawn out with a Hook, against Mr. Hobbes, 12mo. 1653; and were manifestly publish'd to help off his foregoing wretched performance, The Epitomy. They contain about seventy pages, and about as many observations on our author's history; pretending to note his mistakes, and clear some doubtful passages therein. Tho' whoever shall examine them may find, that he has made more passages doubtful than he has clear'd; and as for mistakes, the greatest are those which himself makes of his author; sometimes perverting his sentiments; sometimes opposing his citations as his opinions; and at others, correcting his opinions out of the citations he had approv'd of. In some places, he is so poor a corrector as to fall upon his author for the lapses of his printer; in many, labours about things of no consequence; and in most, notes no mistake, nor clears any doubt, according to his title, but recites a passage only to make some superfluous additions to it, from his own bottomless fund of pedantry, or some reference to others of his own stupid writings. So that he seems throughout like some broker, who has all his life been storing his upper rooms with a great deal of old lumber, that he may be able, when any curious antique is produced, only to oppose others of a different form, how inferior soever in use or application, rather to puzzle the ignorant in what they should prefer, than convince them of what they ought to reject; having no opportunity so creditable to disclose the variety of his own trifles, or hopes of making them pass for something of value. This man might have swell'd out an article or two more in his said tract, from what Raleigh himself has observ'd upon his own history when it came from the press, could that critic have come at his remarks. For there is such a curiosity remaining in his family, as one of the first printed copies, which had been his own book. 'Tis printed on large paper, with the maps colour'd, bound in red leather, with gilt leaves, and his crest, the Cap of Honour, stamp'd on the covers. In this copy Sir Walter has made two or three corrections with his own pen; particularly in the 535th page of the three last books, there is one escape which has not been corrected in any of the following impressions, wherein I have particularly looked for it; where speaking of the Roman army which was to face Hannibal, Raleigh has, under the words five hundred horse, drawn a line; and, in the margin, written, "It must needs be five thousand horse; for shortly after, Nero carries with him a part of his army to his colleague, in which there was a thousand horse."

modern history, to be any further an author of that which is ancient. There is, indeed, a little intimation of the design he had upon some ancient part of our English story, preserved in a letter of his own, written it seems, tho' undated, before his great work was publish'd, to that acquaintance, whose library was most likely to accommodate him with those uncommon books which he wanted for his purpose. This letter is as follows. " Sir Robert Cotton, If you have any of these old books, or any manuscripts wherein I may find any of our British antiquities; if you please to lend them me for a little while, I will safely restore them, and think myself much beholden unto you: or if you have any old French history, wherein our nation is mention'd; or any else, in what language soever. (So subscribes himself) Your poor friend, W. Raleigh." <sup>a</sup> But this does not sufficiently assure us, whether the use of these books was to continue his General History, or furnish him upon some more particular subject, however, we may incline with the writer of Sir Robert Cotton's life to the former opinion. And as for the reasons of one ingenious author, why Sir Walter Raleigh was the most proper person to write the history of his own time; <sup>b</sup> and the opinion of another, " That his admirable performance already publish'd, sufficiently shews, that if he had attempted the history of his own country, or his own times, he would have excell'd even Livy or Thucydides; and that the Annals of queen Elizabeth by his pen, without diminishing from the serious, judicious Camden, had been the brightest glory of her reign; and would have transmitted his History as the standard of our language even to the present age:" <sup>c</sup> These are still no affirmatives that he did finish such a second part. So that his own intimations in the first part, reserv'd and inconclusive as they are, seem to have been the only foundation of that formal story, " How Sir Walter Raleigh, a few days before his death, sent for Walter Burre, the bookseller who had printed his first volume, and taking him by the hand, asked him, how that work of his had sold? who answer'd, so slowly that it had undone him; hereupon Raleigh stepping to his desk, reach'd out the other part of his history, which he had brought down to the times he liv'd in, then saying, with a sigh, Ah friend! has the first part undone thee? the second volume shall undo no more; this ungrateful world is unworthy of it; so stept to the fire, threw it in, and set his foot on it till it was consum'd." But, as we observed before, Raleigh had no leisure to finish such a second part of his history down to his own time. In the next place, 'tis no ways probable that he, who, in regard to the first part, could follow the rule of Seneca; that he, who having satisfied his own conscience, could disregard the censure of others, should sacrifice so great a part of his labours, or any part, in such a rash and inconsiderate manner, to the sudden representations of a bookseller, without ever suspecting any mercenary ends in him. Further, it does not appear true that the first part did sell slowly, for there was a second edition of it set forth by that very bookseller, within three years after the first, as we have in a note before observ'd; and lastly, the first man we can meet with who reports the same, is a trifling and superficial writer, who produces no authority for his assertion. <sup>d</sup>

As to the unfinish'd parts he might have of such a continuation, to admit that they were thus destroy'd would, moreover, in no wise agree with an account we have more satisfactorily attested of that great quantity there was in being of Sir Walter Raleigh's unprinted writings, several years after his death. For it is affirm'd to us, " That the famous Mr. Hamden, a little before the civil wars, was at the charge of transcribing three thousand four hundred fifty two sheets of Sir Walter Raleigh's manuscripts, as the amanuensis himself told me (says my author) who had his close chamber, his fire and candle, with an attendant to deliver

<sup>a</sup> Sir Walter Raleigh to Sir Robert Cotton, the original; in the Cottonian library, Julius C 3, at the top of this letter there is a list of the old authors, above a dozen in number, which in the beginning of the letter we see, as above, he refers to. And for the satisfaction of the curious, they are here set down as follows. Sigebert's Chronicles, Vincentis Speculum Historiale, Gerwastus Tilsherinus, Phillip Bergomus, Natalis Talipes, Amandus Zirexens, Caius Londinius, John Major de gestis Scotorum, Leffabius of Henault, Alex. Evesham, Brute Book, Chronicle of Teucherry, Peter de Icham. This is the letter which Dr. Thomas Smith made use of when he was speaking of the great men who sought the assistance of Sir Robert Cotton's library; and having selected from the rest, as most worthy of note, Sir Francis Bacon and Sir Walter Raleigh, goes on thus: Quorum hinc, carceris in turri Londinensi panem latus, in secunda universitatis historiarum parte antiquitates Britannicas indagaturus, ut quosdam codices tum typis impressos, tum manu exaratos, sibi utendos dare vellet Cotto-

<sup>d</sup> Will. Winstanley's Worthies of England, 8vo. 1660, p. 256, in the Life of Sir Walter Raleigh; wherein it is true, as the author owns, there are most material errors, one whereof he rectifies in his table of errata; but leaves others as gross uncorrected. This writer, in another such like performance, call'd The Lives of the English Poets, 8vo. 1687, has repeated this story of Sir Walter Raleigh's burning the second part of his history in the same manner as above, and with equal probability, being here also silent of any authority for the truth thereof.

"him the originals, and take his copies as fast as he could write them." <sup>a</sup> Yet what is become of this treasure now, I have not been able to learn; for, if we suppose that Mr. Hamden would not be at the trouble and charge of transcribing any of our author's writings which had then been printed; and grant that all of his which have been printed since that time, as well as all we can hear of remaining in MS. which are allow'd to be his, were part of that collection or quantity, they will not, both join'd together, as might be computed from what is here observed of them, amount to a fourth part thereof, tho' we should admit two or three pieces more, also ascribed to him, which have not yet been named, and happen to fall under this historical division. The first of them is call'd, A notable and memorable Story of the cruel War between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries: Gather'd out of Polybius and other authors, by that famous Historian Sir Walter Raleigh. <sup>b</sup> Tho' this was indeed written by him, it is no different work from what he had before publish'd, but reviv'd during the civil wars, to reflect with some authority upon the distractions of those times. The other two pieces might seem to fall within the intended continuation of his Universal History; but the first of them, call'd The Life and Death of Mahomet; the Conquest of Spain; together with the Rising and Ruin of the Saracen Empire, ascribed to Sir Walter Raleigh near twenty years after his death, by the bookseller who dedicated it to his son, <sup>c</sup> is, except a few leaves about that of Mahomet, no more than a translation of an epitomy made by some ignorant Spanish author, chiefly from what one of his own fabulous countrymen had written of a fictitious prince named Jacob Almanzor, <sup>d</sup> as I have been assur'd by a gentleman of great knowledge both in the Spanish and Oriental writers, whose answer, having satisfy'd me with the intelligence I was ambitious of procuring about this book, I here take the liberty of subjoining for the satisfaction also of the publick. <sup>e</sup> But the stile itself, so uncouth in some places, so meagre in others, and incorrect, especially in known things, places, and persons, might of itself exclude our author from having any hand in it. The other piece is stiled, An Introduction to a Breviary of the History of England; with the reign of King William I. entitled the Conqueror, written by Sir Walter Raleigh. It was near fourscore years after his death before this was publish'd. Yet there are several old manuscript copies of it in the libraries of the curious, <sup>f</sup> which entitle him the author of it;

<sup>d</sup> There seems to be other translations of the life of this pretended prince than that which follows this life of Mahomet in the book ascribed to Sir Walter Raleigh, as Almanzor, the learned and victorious King that conquer'd Spain, his Life and Death; translated from the Spanish by Robert Ashley, 4to. Lond. 1627. La vie de Jacob Almanzor roi d'Arabie. 8vo. Paris, 1638. Almanzor's Life, with the Conquest of Spain by the Moors, 8vo. 1693, &c.

<sup>e</sup> "Sir * * * * * The greater part of this book, containing The History of the Conquest of Spain, and the Life of the Caliph Jacob Almanzor, in whose reign the author supposes that conquest to have been made, with an account of his immediate predecessor and successors, is said by the author, page 34, to be abbreviated out of two Arabian writers, translated into Spanish in the year 1606; both the authors living in the time of Almanzor; the one, a captain in that war, and the other for 20 years together of his chamber, and after his death a provincial governor in Arabia Felix. But it appears to be no other than an abstract, or translation of an abstract made in Spanish, of the first book of the first part, and the first book of the second part of Miguel de Luna's History of the Loss of Spain, entitled, Historia verdadera del Rey D. Rodrigo, &c. which history he pretended to have translated in 1589 (for that is the date of the first part) from the Arabic of Abulcacin Tarif Abuntarique, written in the year of the Hejra 140, who appears to have inserted in his work The Life of the Caliph Jacob Almanzor, written in the same language by another author, named Ali Abouqusan, vice roy and governor of the province of Duque in Arabia, in the year of the Hejra 110."

"Whether there ever were two such Arabian historians as these, is very uncertain; but certain it is, that de Luna's history can be no translation of any genuine Arabian writer, but must be wholly a forgery of his own: for there never was any such caliph of the Saracens in Asia as Jacob Almanzor; the whole account of him, his father, son and grandson, being a mere romance in every particular. Spain was conquer'd in

"the reign of Al Walid Ebn Abd' almalec, the VIth of the Arabian Khalifs of the family of Omeyya, who died in the year 96. The only Khalif in Asia who took the surname of Al Mansur, was the second of the family of Al Abbas, named Abu Jaafar Abdalla, and began his reign in the year of the Hejra 137, which is 35 years after de Luna's Almanzor is said to have died. Nor did any Arabian ever write in the manner of de Luna, or send such letters as he has inserted in his history; wherein tho' some particulars relating to the war and conquest of Spain may be true, yet whatever he says of the Arabians in Asia, or the Khalifs there, is utterly false, and without the least shadow of truth."

"As to the life of Mahomet, which takes up only the first 24 pages of this book, it was prefixed either by the translator or abbreviator, and extracted from the accounts given of that pretended prophet by christian writers; and being for the most part false and ridiculous, deserves little regard."

"I cannot think therefore, notwithstanding the opinion of the bookseller in his dedication, that a person of Sir Walter Raleigh's learning and judgment was ever any way concern'd in this book: we hear not, that any copy of it was ever found in his study, or that any MS. of it, ascrib'd to him, is preserved, as of his genuine pieces, in the libraries of the curious. And had the author or translator look'd ever so little into the Saracen history, even as given by the Byzantine historians, and the Latin writers of the middle age, he must have known better than to be impos'd on by so bare-fac'd an impostor. Whether the stile and language of this performance confirm my opinion or not, you * * * * * &c."

<sup>f</sup> As the Cotton library, Titus F 3, 17. that of Sir Kenelm Digby; the Harleian library; that of Dr. Thomas Gale, &c. But the copy from whence this book was printed in 8vo. 1693, being among the manuscripts of archbishop Sancroft, was committed to the press by Dr. John Moore, afterwards bishop of Ely, as I have it attested under the hand of Robert Keck, Esq; late of the Touz.

it ; but it was written at least two years before he publish'd his History of the World, because it is inscribed to a person who died so long before the said publication, in these words : “ I intend by the help of God and your furtherance, right noble earl of Salisbury, to write a brief history of England from William the first, entitled the Conqueror, to the end of queen Elizabeth of perpetual memory.” But by then his History of the World was finish'd, he was, as we have observed, also from his own words, discouraged from all continuation. To those discouragements might be added, the ungrateful treatment which was shewn to this Part he did publish, at its first appearance : for tho' we have observed what universal approbation it has met with since the author's death ; yet how it was receiv'd as soon as it came abroad and made its first visits at court, we are yet to relate.

THOSE, who thought the king must needs be a patron of authors because he was one of the number, have been ready to insinuate, that his favour encreased towards Raleigh in proportion to the proofs his pen had given of his abilities ; therefore, that his many excellent Writings, and especially this History of the World, were the most powerful intercessors for his releasment out of the Tower ; as if his majesty, in respect to his own honour, thought it in vain longer to confine his person, since no condition could confine his fame ; or, in regard to Raleigh's merit, that he had well deserved no place should be a barrier to his liberty, who had given such extraordinary testimony that no age could set a bound to his knowledge. Sanderfon has ascrib'd the freedom which not long after ensu'd, to one of those motives ; where he says, “ Sir Walter Raleigh, wearied with long imprisonment, and having there spent his time well in the History of the World, made his petition more passable to the king ; whose love to learning granted him now at last his liberty ; and, not long after, leave to wander after a design to the western world, where he had been in several climates before.”<sup>a</sup> But others, who seem to have known the matter much better, or have more ingenuously imparted it, assure us, that Raleigh's excellent talents were so far from ingratiating him with the king, “ that tho' his majesty had been intemperately praised by flatterers for some of the weakest of his own compositions, yet he could not forbear, out of an impertinent emulation, to affect Sir Walter Raleigh the less, because of the great repute which followed him for his excellent pen.”<sup>b</sup> Nay, we are elsewhere told, in answer to Sanderfon above, that Raleigh's History of the World gave the king so much displeasure, “ that at its first publication it was forbid ; and particularly, for some passages in it which offended the Spaniard ; as also for being too plain with the faults of princes in his preface.”<sup>c</sup> For it is, indeed, replenish'd with many remarkable examples of divine vengeance pour'd forth on princes of many other nations as well as our own, who strove to establish their thrones by oppression and iniquity. That passage in answer to Sanderfon, is so far from being deny'd by this writer, that he afterwards confirm'd it in contradiction to what himself had written as above, about Raleigh's petition being made more passable by his History ; where, after his gross manner of interpretation, he says, “ King James and all other princes had cause of complaint, because his whole book sets out the eastern monarchs with much glory, and exclaims against christian princes as most inhuman ; tracing all the English sovereigns from the conquest, especially Henry the eighth ; whom, for his daughter's honour, Sir Walter Raleigh might have spar'd from gall and bitterness.” And a little further, “ King James might perhaps observe more, to repress the wickedness of such a person, who, under pretence of taxing a vice in the father, intended cunningly to stain the whole race, &c.”<sup>d</sup> This objection against Raleigh's character of that king, is more particularly ascribed to king James by another writer also before-cited, who tells us, “ That after much scorn cast upon Raleigh's History, the king, being modestly demanded What fault he found? answer'd, as one surpris'd, That Raleigh had spoken ir- in one of the printed copies of the said book in my possession. The said Dr. Moore's preface to this piece, however some have thought it father'd on our author, is in these words, “ This life of William the Conqueror writ by Sir Walter Raleigh, was found in the library of a person of high quality. Whosoever has been conversant in the works of that accomplish'd knight, and a little acquainted with his great genius and spirit, and his manly unaffected style, will make no doubt but what here is presented unto the world was his genuine issue. For the comprehensive and penetrating thoughts, the lively imagination, and the mature exact judgment of Sir Walter Raleigh, do all manifestly appear in this small treatise. It may be matter of some wonder that a work fill'd with such a number of judicious reflections upon the nature of government in general, and so many wise observations relating to the particular state of our own country, should have been thus long condemn'd to obscurity, had not an ill fate attended the learned compositions, as well as the brave actions of this renowned gentleman. But by what unhappy accident soever it has hitherto been confin'd to privacy, it was thought it would be an injury to the publick any longer to conceal a just and true account of the reign of William the first, wherein so many remarkable matters and great revolutions happen'd, and to which the writers of government and policy in our nation have very frequent recourse ; since the transactions of that time, unto which they so commonly appeal, are here related with that faithfulness, brevity and clearness, that become an exact historian.”

“reverently of king Henry the eighth!”<sup>a</sup> as if he would have reflected a breach of gratitude upon our Historian towards his benefactors the late queen, in speaking such truth when he was to give a character of her father as, not only others who read it must concur in, seeing the Historian has so many proofs at his finger’s end to confirm it; but what that king himself, were he alive, on whom it was written, must also have allowed; since it is only a paraphrase upon his own dying confession, that he had been a Prince, who never spared man in his anger, nor woman in his lust. But if king James could thus object against Raleigh for one character, and pay him no thanks for another which follows in the same paragraph of that Preface, and in some parts of the History itself; this may perhaps best shew where lay the breach of gratitude. But however his majesty might think it a kind of blasphemy, that any below the dignity of princes should be the censors of them: yet that objection aforesaid seems not to be the natural cause, says our last-quoted author, of his dislike to this history, “since none ever exclaim’d more against that prince than usually king James himself did.” And others, more particularly still, are inclin’d to believe, that any liberty Raleigh may have taken with the characters of other princes, was not so much the real cause of such disgust in king James, as, through the insinuations of some mischievous sycophants about him, who well knew what humour might be most agreeably fed, that several parts of the history contained an oblique and artful exposure of himself and his ministry; as if, truly, the general History of the World was chiefly a secret History, or satire upon his Court; and Scotch faces were to be seen in it, stuck upon old Jewish, Babylonian or Assyrian shoulders. For, as one has observ’d, “There was a time, when one of our most renowned Historians could not comment upon a piece of the Old Testament, without being thought to write a libel upon his own times: and the king was almost led to fancy he saw his own features in the face of Ninias the son of queen Semiramis; but surely, if he could think his justice censured in the story of Achab’s taking away Naboth’s vineyard, and not commended in that of the French king’s conduct towards his judge and admiral of France; he must not only have been a very captious and self-tormenting reader, but have satiriz’d himself more sharply by engrossing of applications, or acquiescing in resemblances, than he could have been by that author, had he really intended any.”<sup>b</sup> But the truth is, that conscious minds can find in every example something to chastise themselves; and, to stomachs vitiated, through foul and unwholesome administrations, with evil habits, the most innocent diet is upbraiding. That Raleigh foresaw his enemies would make such perverse construction and misuse of his History, is evident enough in his own words; where, mentioning the choice he had made, as least exceptionable, of the elder times to describe, he yet anticipates this objection, “Against this choice also: Why may it not be said, that in speaking of the pass’d I point at the present; and tax the vices of those who are yet living, in their persons who are long since dead, and have it laid to my charge? But this I cannot help, tho’ innocent; and certainly, if there be any, who, finding themselves spotted like the tygers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting them over anew, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.”<sup>c</sup> Yet such fault there was, we see, found; and so falsely was he accused. Thus the honour which should reward a publick benefit, is stifled by private prejudice.

We are therefore to seek some other mediator for Raleigh’s deliverance out of prison than his merit by this publick benefit; and that, we shall at last find to be his money, tho’ other causes in our common histories are also suggested, especially that which seemed most effectual, the offer he made of fitting out an expedition to secure, and possess for the crown, a gold mine in Guiana, which he had himself discover’d when he was formerly in that country, and which, since that time, had been by others so amply testified, that further confirmation was not now requir’d. So that Raleigh’s being deceiv’d by Keymis with ore of a golden complexion, which he brought from thence, or by any chymical tricks, such as secretly slipping real gold with the ore into the melting-pot, are foolish untruths.<sup>d</sup> Now that offer Raleigh had made at least three years before he obtain’d his liberty, with no unreasonable expectation of its being accepted, since king James had so publickly asserted and confirm’d the right of England to that Country, through Sir Walter Raleigh’s conquest and discoveries therein, with the submission he had gain’d from the chief lords thereof, as to have given commissions and patents for the possession of the same, that is to say, all from the river of Amazons to the Dessequibe, and all the islands for twenty miles about, in his majesty’s name; which were accordingly executed in all due form by captain Charles Leigh and captain Robert Harcourt, which last left a colony there of thirty persons for three years, as may be read at large in the narratives of their several expeditions. <sup>a</sup> Besides, the publick invitations and encouragement which afterwards ensued, to all who would again settle and plant in that new-discover'd part of America, <sup>b</sup> gave the Discoverer himself no doubt, the greater hopes that his own propositions, being not for his private, but the publick benefit (yet at his own expence, and that of such friends as he should engage in the adventure) could not but be embrac'd. Add to this, the advantages of his further knowing the riches of this country, even while he was in prison, not only by the long conversation he had with those Indians, whom we find here with him in the former part of his confinement, but others who from time to time came over to him. For during this long imprisonment, he held constant intercourse with Guiana, and was at the charge every year, or every second year, of sending a ship or more thither, to keep them in hopes of being relieved from the Spaniards, <sup>c</sup> who had again encroach'd upon them, and cruelly massacred both several of the natives, and of his own men. <sup>d</sup> So that the number of Voyages he set forth for Guiana, was at least as many, if not more, than those he is before observed to have fitted out for Virginia.

But all this experience, which should have recommended his offer, serv'd at first only to render it unacceptable. For the Treasurer Cecyll being then alive, he, with two or three others who bore the sway at court, were resolv'd to discountenance it; not that they so much doubted the probability that such treasure might remain unpossess'd, or the knowledge and resolution of Raleigh to compass it, so much as his disposition towards themselves, if by a successful return he should purchase the king's favour. Therefore, to prevent such a rival as he might prove to Them, the advantage he propos'd to the State was neglected; nay, so deeply had they rooted prejudices in the king's breast towards him in this particular, as well as in others before mention'd, that when his majesty was sollicit'd by any person in Raleigh's behalf (and Royal solicitors he had) he, with that implicit reliance on other men's reports, which those in supreme station so often bury their own judgments and their justice in, would answer, That his council knew him better than he did. But after Cecyll's death, and now that Sir Ralph Winwood was secretary of state, <sup>e</sup> Raleigh reviv'd his proposal to him, and, in a letter, told him with relation to those two or three earwigs who were ever crawling about the king, and at the mercy of whose representations he had so long lain, that it was his only infelicity the king did not know him as well as those courtiers pretended to do: "For, had his majesty known me, says he, I had never been here where I now am; or, had I known his majesty, they had never been so long there where they now are. His majesty not knowing me has been my ruin, and his misknowing them has been the ruin of a goodly part of his estate. But they are all of them now, some living and some dying, come to his majesty's knowledge." We learn further out of the said letter, that both queen Anne, who had inform'd herself from the beginning of all that Raleigh had been accus'd with, and her brother the king of Denmark, at both times of his being in England, <sup>f</sup> were thoroughly satisfy'd of his innocency, otherwise they would never have moved his majesty in his behalf. And prince Henry, who had been curious in searching into the nature of his offences, had been frequently a mediator for him, as we have read before. Hereupon, says Raleigh, "The wife, the brother, and the son of a king, do not use to sue for men suspect; but since they all have done it, and with reference to me alone, you, strengthened by their example, may with the more hardiness do the like." Towards the end, Raleigh having acknowledg'd, that all he had remaining was owing to the king, and that he was ready to sacrifice it all in his majesty's service, concludes with this noble distinction, To die for the king, and not by the king, is all the ambition I have in the world. <sup>g</sup>

This and other like addresses to that new secretary, advanced not Raleigh's request so much, but he found it necessary to use stronger interest than what he was here making, and more substantial arguments than could flow from a pen. For whatever "pity of his sufferings, his merit and fame of learning now begat in many, or by whatever means of the French ambassador, with others of our own lords," it is pretended, in our common accounts of him, that "he got freedom of repairing for his health to his house at St. James's, a year or two before he procur'd his commission for his voyage to Guiana," <sup>h</sup> we are more positively and particularly told, "That Sir William St. John and Sir Edward Villiers, half-brother to the lady Villiers, afterwards dutchess of Buckingham, procur'd Sir Walter Raleigh's liberty, and had fifteen hundred “ pounds for their labour.”<sup>a</sup> It further appears, that these used their power with Sir George Villiers, the new rising favourite at court, and so obtained the king’s consent for Raleigh enlargement: for there is a letter of Raleigh’s acknowledgments to that favourite in these words “ Sir, You have, by your mediation, put me again into the world; I can but acknowledge it; for to pay any part of your favour by any service of mine as yet, it is not in my power. If it succeed well, a good part of the honour shall be yours; and if I do not also make it profitable unto you, I shall shew myself exceeding ungrateful. In the meanwhile, and, till God discover the success, I beseech you to reckon me among the number of your faithful servants, tho’ the least able. W. Raleigh.”<sup>b</sup> This letter is dated only March 17, but probably written in this year last mention’d, 1615; because three days afterwards, as Camden has precisely remember’d, Sir Walter Raleigh was releas’d out of the Tower.<sup>c</sup> So that he thus purchas’d his liberty in the thirteenth year of his confinement; that is to say, after he had been (without intermission) twelve years, three months, and five days in the said Tower of London, besides near three months more at his first commitment thither, and during his arraignment at Winchester.

of the Tower.

At this time Carr, earl of Somerset, had been about four or five months in the said Tower with his countess, for the barbarous impoisonment of Sir Thomas Overbury about two years before in the same place, to which he had treacherously driven him, for only having obstructed the said earl’s vile and scandalous commerce with that lewd woman, while she was young Essex’s wife. “ These two accidents (at this time drew great notice) happening (as ’tis observed) in a tract ascrib’d to the lord Brook) so much beyond all expectation; that the one, being a special favourite of the king, the other a condemned man; the one imprison’d, the other set at liberty; gave great occasion of speech and rumour, and so much the more wonder and admiration, because of Raleigh’s wit and policy.”<sup>d</sup> Raleigh is further said by the same author, to have given Somerset many quips and taunts during his said imprisonment; and it may not be improbable, towards such an undeserving intruder upon his estate. But, as this earl of Somerset was convicted of felony for the said murder, whereby the two hundred thousand pounds he had heap’d up, and lands to the income of nineteen thousand pounds per Annum being again dispers’d;<sup>e</sup> and as the king had laid that heavy curse upon himself and his posterity which he did, if ever he pardon’d any of the said murderers, it might have been thought that Raleigh’s comparison of himself and that noble malefactor, would not have been spoil’d, when he said, That the whole History of the World had not the like precedent, of a king’s prisoner to purchase freedom, and his bosom favourite to have the halter, but in scripture, in the case of Mordecai and Haman. Instead of that, Raleigh is said, by the relator of this passage, to have been told, the king should reply upon hearing this observation, That Raleigh might die in that deceit;<sup>f</sup> and so he did, as this author truly says: for the king now sav’d the life of the one, as much to the astonishment of the world, as he afterwards put the other to death. But he could do no less, if his favourite was really a master of such secrets as are elsewhere spoken of.<sup>g</sup> And this is enough to resolve why the misfortunes of that earl, if they may be called such, which at the worst were more favourable than his merits in any wise deserved, were not equal to his crimes.<sup>h</sup>

Raleigh being thus at liberty, soon appears busy in making preparation for his voyage. To this purpose he called in the eight thousand pounds, which he had lent to the countess of Bedford, i reckon’d in king James his declaration, a competent satisfaction for Sherborne; tho’ it was afterwards valued by the state at 5000 l. per annum. But seeing that not sufficient to fit out a fleet in the manner he found necessary, his wife consented also to sell her house and lands at Micham in Surrey, for which he received twenty-five hundred pounds;<sup>k</sup> all which and more he expended in this expedition. And what frenzy could possess him, as he says himself, thus to dispose of his whole substance, and undertake such a toilsome and perilous voyage now that his constitution was impair’d by such a long confinement, besides age itself, sickness and affliction, were he not assur’d thereby of doing his prince service, bettering his country by commerce, and restoring his family to their estates, all from the mines of Guiana; and, says he, if I myself had not seen them with my own eyes.<sup>l</sup> I have not yet heard who was the purchaser of that estate at Micham; but there is a letter of Raleigh’s to a nobleman extant, which possibly relates thereunto. It is to entreat him to make an impartial valuation of some lands to a rising favourite who was to be the purchaser, and is penn'd in the following words. "I humbly beseech your lordship to give me leave, and pardon too, if I need it, for the answering of those things which you were lately pleas'd to object against me; and that you will charitably also consider both of my demands, and of the reasons which embolden me to make them. Those answers go here, in a paper which is enclos'd, apart; and my letter shall say but thus much, that the gentleman, who is so greatly in favour, hath many fair fortunes before him, and we, nothing to look for but misery; and that he is better able to give us above the worth of the land, than we in condition to abate any part thereof. And therefore we humbly beseech your lordship, that your compassion and care of honour, may be the judge between his prosperous navigation, and our shipwreck: and that your charity for us, and your desire of satisfaction for him, may equal the ballance between us. I hope so heartily to find all just favour at your hands, as I will venture, upon this, to assure you, that I will do all my utmost to make my wife and son forget their misery in themselves, and to be ever mindful of their duty towards your lordship; to whom I hope they will be, as I am sure myself have been, and am, a most faithful, humble servant." <sup>a</sup>

BESIDES the ten thousand five hundred pounds which it cost Sir Walter Ralegh to put himself in equipage for this long-proposed voyage, a much greater sum than would have paid for his liberty of receding from it, or for a formal pardon, had he thought he needed, and had gone about to purchase it; there were many co-adventurers, who, by contributions to the expence thereof, entitled themselves to a share in the returns. But most of these are called by Ralegh, a company of voluntiers, who had never seen the sea nor wars; and, except some forty gentlemen, a very dissolute, disorderly, and ungovernable crew, "whom their friends thought it an exceeding good gain to be discharg'd of, at the hazard of some thirty, forty or fifty pounds, knowing they could not have lived a whole year so cheap at home." <sup>b</sup> There were, moreover, several merchants, not only in England but foreign parts, who contributed to this Mine-adventure; so confident were they that it was no chimera, no supposititious or airy treasure that was promised or pursued. One of these merchants, afterwards knighted, and very eminent for his dealings, was named Peter Vanlore, who so approved of Sir Walter Ralegh's undertaking, that he not only sent a letter to his brother Sir Adrian Tibbaut in Amsterdam, requesting him to engage another merchant there to communicate something he knew of the riches in Guiana to Sir Walter Ralegh; but made that request in Ralegh's own manner of expression, from a copy which he drew up for him. This draught, as I have it from the said original, is as follows: "Brother Tibotes, There is a merchant in Amsterdam, that for the love he bears to my honourable friend Sir Walter Ralegh, is content to discover somewhat of importance unto him in Guiana, to which country Sir Walter Ralegh is now preparing to go; but he doth require assurance from Sir Walter Ralegh, that he himself may be assur'd to enjoy such part of the commodity discover'd, as he shall agree upon with Sir Walter Ralegh by his deputy Mr. Henry Hovenar. I do therefore pray you to speak with the party which Mr. Hovenar will bring unto you, and to know what assurances he will require, which to pleasure Sir Walter, I shall be willing to give; that is to say, to give him assurance that upon Sir Walter's return into England, the charges being deducted, the discoverer shall receive from Sir Walter such part of the said merchandize as Sir Walter and he shall agree on; altho' there needs no such assurance to be given, because his majesty doth assure all Sir Walter's partners by the Great Seal of England, That they shall truly and quietly enjoy all their parts and shares of what goods, merchandize or treasure soever shall be returned; out of which Great Seal of England, the discoverer shall have an assignment for so much as belongs unto him, to be deliver'd here in London, to whomsoever he shall appoint to receive it." Then in a new line he concludes thus: "To Mr. Peter Vanlore. This is the letter which I desire you to write to your brother in Amsterdam; and for any assurance you shall give, I will again put you in sureties to save you harmless. W. Ralegh." <sup>c</sup> This letter is dated July 1.

<sup>c</sup> This copy of a letter for Sir Peter Vanlore to engage a Dutch merchant in Sir Walter Ralegh's Guianian adventure, from the original draught of Sir Walter's own hand, is in the possession of Brown Willis, of Waddon-Hall in Essex, to whom we are obliged for this communication. And a transcript appears to have been sent according to Sir Walter's request; for, after his death, his lady having commenced law-suits against the said Vanlore, this copy was produced in court, as appears by the following endorsement upon it: "This letter was shewn unto Matthias Penevart, at the time of his examination, on the part and behalf of Sir Peter Vanlore, kn<sup>t</sup> defendant, against Dame Elizabeth Ralegh, widow, complainant. 12th June. 1623. Signed Martin Bapill."

1616. And if Raleigh had his commission for that voyage before this time, as it appears he had, by his citing it, then it must be erroneously dated, being near two months after, in king James his Declaration.<sup>a</sup> Here again, that commission seems to have been given under the Great Seal of England; and also elsewhere:<sup>b</sup> In that Declaration, 'tis said to be under the Privy Seal. But there are other things observable of this commission as it is there printed, and in other places, as we shall see presently.

IN the mean while we may here observe a little opposition that was made to this voyage. And indeed some persons at court, who might remember what advances Raleigh had formerly made there, by the means of several exploits which he undertook at a distance from it; and others, admonish'd by conscience, that every friendly gale in his navigation would be splitting them upon a rock, might well be expected to obstruct, as far as they could, his progress: but none do we hear of so impatient and clamorous against it as the Spaniard. For there had been now in England, about three years, an agent from Spain, named Diego Sarmiento de Acuna, better known, but not till about the time of Raleigh's death, or perhaps after it, by the title of count de Gondomar; a man, who, if he gain'd that influence he did over king James purely by art, must be allowed a good share of dexterity in the mysteries of negotiation; but as he was adapted by nature to soothe and captivate him, no less than by the pretensions of his agency, it diminishes the wonders of his success in making that king such a subject to his enchantments, and keeping him so many years a prisoner as it were in the Tower he had heap'd up of airy and glittering promises: yet what reward was reserved, for all his services here, in his own country, and how this ardent slave to the will and pleasure of his master, was both executioner of his royal pride as well as other passions, and sacrifice also at last to them, must be left for those to display who have more leisure to dilate upon such retaliations of Providence. This was the man who (as he is represented in king James's Declaration) now "took great alarm," and is said to have "made loud and vehement assertions to his majesty in repeated audiences, that he knew, and "had discover'd the intention and enterprize of Sir Walter Raleigh to be but hostile and piratical, tending to the breach between the two crowns, and the danger and destruction of the king his master's subjects in those parts; protesting in a sort against it." To which that the king should answer, (as it is there said after Raleigh's death) "He would send Sir Walter Raleigh with a limited commission (but how limited it was will soon appear) and that "he durst not, upon peril of his head, do any such matter; and if he did, he would surely do justice upon him, or send him bound hand and foot into Spain, with all the gold and goods he should obtain by robbery and bring home, were they never so great."<sup>d</sup> Then the king by Sir Ralph Winwood, got both a solemn protestation from Raleigh, that he had no other intention but only to go to those gold mines; and also a close letter to his majesty (as it is here in his declaration justly call'd) confirming the same. This close letter was both written close to the purpose, or in such expressive terms as to have laid open the whole scheme of Raleigh's voyage; and also as a matter to be kept close, or with the utmost privacy; for 'tis said, that upon such communication, his majesty promised, on the word of a king, to keep it secret:<sup>e</sup> and it would have prevented all supposition of dissimulation, if this close letter had been fairly exhibited in that declaration, had it been when this was pen'd, in the king's possession, as it ought according to his royal promise. On the contrary, this seems to have been the very letter, by which, through the Spanish ambassador's means, his master the king of Spain was pre-admonished of Raleigh's whole enterprize, and had sent to Guiana, before he left the British channel, to prepare a greater force than his, to oppose him, as will hereafter appear. Nay, 'tis visible by what immediately follows in the said declaration, both that this close letter (how closely soever the contents of it are with-held) did reveal the particulars of Raleigh's naval strength, and that the king did divulge it to the Spanish ambassador; because it was so far from making him recede from his former jealousy, that he is discover'd to have objected thereupon against the number of ships Raleigh had prepared for the said voyage,<sup>f</sup> to which Raleigh then doubtless made as proper answer, as we shall find he did hereafter. But in short such a proposal, by one carrying the reputation of such an active, witty and valiant gentleman, especially of so great a commander at sea, as his enemies allow he had; <sup>g</sup> one who must be thought most wary above all others of incurring king James's displeasure, under which he had so long suffer'd; one who had given such publick attestations of his sincerity in the prosecution of this proposall ; and one who, as the greatest proof he could give thereof, was actually embarking his whole fortune as well as credit, together with those of his friends and relations, all finding security for their good behaviour, without any charge to the crown if they fail'd, and with prospect of great advantage if they succeeded, was so far from being overthrown by any remonstrances of the ambassador himself, or from being thought a most noble and generous overture by all other men; that even the king's honour is acknowledg'd, in his own Declaration, to have been engag'd, not to deny his people the adventure and hope of so great riches.<sup>a</sup> And yet what character of that king's honour towards his people, is expos'd in the same leaf of that very Declaration, where it is pretended, that in his own princely judgment he gave no belief to it, as being perswaded that in nature there were no such mines entire, or that the Spaniards, so industrious in the chace of treasure, would have so long neglected the same ; is left to the reader's distinction. But it may be best discover'd by the care taken to secure his majesty's dividend so clearly, and to express many other articles so doubtfully, in the commission itself, of which we shall now give an impartial abstract, whether it was from a magnanimous principle or a mercenary one, from upright policy or downright prevarication, that the same was granted ; being as follows.

“ JAMES, by the grace of God, &c. To all to whom these presents shall come, &c.

THIS abstract is made from the said commission, as it is printed in king James’s Declaration,<sup>a</sup> and may agree with that which seems also to have been given us from the records.<sup>b</sup> Whether there was, originally, any preamble to it we cannot say. But there are authors who affirm, that in this commission king James called him his trusty and well-beloved Sir Walter Raleigh.<sup>c</sup> Tho’ these may be words of course in such like instruments, yet if some words were thus taken out in that recital aforesaid, it might give reason of inferring that by the same liberty others have been squeez’d in. Yet even as it is suffer’d there to appear, ’tis surely far from being so clearly penn’d in point of those limitations it is said in his majesty’s Declaration he promis’d the Spanish ambassador: for here is no limitation to any part of America, not only the South parts but elsewhere being authoriz’d, and all that are habitable, inhabited in some degree or other by heathen and savage people: so vague, so equivocal, and disputable is that distinction: not one word of Guiana, no owning of his own right, or the power he had lately given to plant there, no privilege for working any mine there, nor prohibition to meddle with the king of Spain’s subjects there or elsewhere, as another writer has well observ’d.<sup>d</sup> On the contrary, full liberty to carry what arms and ammunition they pleas’d for defence, if they should need it; and lastly, the royal assurance of enjoying unmolested whatever they returned with. In short, this commission must easily be observed to have been penn’d, how clearly soever pretended, as if king James did neither know of Sir Walter Raleigh’s intention for and at Guiana; tho’ a little before, he had the whole particulars thereof from Raleigh’s own hand, or that there were any Spaniards planted there; tho’ he appears to have known that also from the Spanish ambassador himself, whose own kinsman, as we shall hear, was sent, during Raleigh’s restraint, from Spain, to build and colonize upon that very spot to which Raleigh had now this unlimited commission, as we may rather term it, to go. For ’tis so much the reverse of that close penn’d letter wherein Raleigh had, so expressively, and so unreservedly, placed his whole trust of this voyage in king James, that it seems contriv’d, both to hoodwink the Spaniard till the action was over, tho’ the king betray’d it himself, and to secure loop-holes sufficient for the royal authority against his exceptions;<sup>e</sup> but they proved so large, that it was thought expedient, in the end, as we shall find, that the commission should not be insisted on to limit or restrain any body.

Whether this indistinct power in that commission made Raleigh more or less importunate for his pardon, we cannot say. Some indeed write, that he laboured mainly to obtain it; but they are led into that belief by the declaration aforesaid: whereas we find it expressly asserted in a letter of Carew Raleigh’s; that his father had overtures made him of procuring his pardon for fifteen hundred pounds by Sir William St. John, one of the persons of whom he purchas’d his freedom, therefore one whose interest was the less to be doubted in this particular; but that Sir Walter Raleigh conferring, a little before his departure from England, with Sir Francis Bacon (newly made lord keeper of the great seal, and not long after lord chancellor) upon this pecuniary pardon, he positively advised Raleigh against it in these words: Sir, the knee-timber of your voyage is money; spare your purse in this particular, for upon my life, you have a sufficient pardon for all that is pass’d already, the king having, under his broad seal, made you

<sup>e</sup> Roger Coke, in his State of England during the Four last Reigns, observes, page 84, “ That this commission but ill agreed with the treaty of peace made with the king of Spain in the second year of king James’s reign.” And a little further, “ That in granting this commission, you see (says he) by what an undistinguish’d power covetousness governs the actions of princes as well as meaner men, against their honour and interest: for at that admiral of your fleet; and given you power of the martial law over your officers and soldiers.<sup>a</sup> But we are elsewhere told, that even for less than half that money beforemention'd, that is to say, "for seven hundred pounds, the said Sir William St. John, and also Sir Edward Villiers (before spoken of) offer'd Sir Walter Ralegh not only his full pardon, but liberty not to go his voyage if he pleas'd; and that he refus'd both; the rather because he was told by Sir Francis Bacon (as above) that his said commission was as good a pardon for all former offences, as the law of England could afford him."<sup>b</sup>

AND now, near seven months after the date of his commission, began his fleet to appear, or rather that part of it which lay in the Thames, and consisted of seven sail. From the Survey which was taken thereof by the appointment of Charles earl of Nottingham the lord admiral, on the 15th of March in the year last named, it appears, that the first of them, or admiral, a brave ship, as described by one who might probably have seen it, and built by Ralegh himself,<sup>c</sup> was named the Destiny, of 440 tons, and 36 pieces (or more) of ordnance; Sir Walter Ralegh general, and his son Walter captain: besides two hundred men, whereof fourscore were gentlemen-volunteers and adventurers, most of them Sir Walter's relations; which number was afterwards encreas'd. Second, the Jafon of London, 240 tons, and 25 pieces of ordnance; captain John Pennington vice-admiral, fourscore men, one gentleman and no more. Third, the Encounter, 160 tons, 17 pieces of ordnance; Edward Hastings captain: (no men more, except the master, mention'd) but he dying in the Indies, was succeeded in the command by captain Whitney. Fourth, the Thunder, 150 tons, 20 pieces of ordnance; Sir Warham Sentleger captain, six gentlemen, sixty soldiers, ten land men. Fifth, the Flying Joan, 120 tons, 14 pieces of ordnance; John Chidley captain, twenty-five men. Sixth, the Southampton, 80 tons, 6 pieces of ordnance; John Bayley captain, twenty-five mariners, two gentlemen. Seventh, the Page, a pinnace, 25 tons, 3 rabnets of brags; James Barker captain, eight sailors.<sup>d</sup> But before Ralegh left the coast of England, he was join'd by as many ships more: so that his whole fleet consisted of thirteen sail, besides his own ship.<sup>e</sup> And tho' we cannot be so particular in the remaining part, we may yet learn thus much of it, that one ship, named the Convertine, was commanded by captain Keymis;<sup>f</sup> another, called the Confidence, was under the charge of captain Woolaston; there was a shallop, named the Flying Hart, under Sir John Ferne; two flyboats, under captain Samuel King, and captain Robert Smith; and a carvel, with perhaps another named the Chudley, besides.<sup>g</sup>

WITH the former part of the fleet Ralegh set sail from the Thames on the 28th of March aforefaid,<sup>h</sup> which was in the year 1617, and was soon after ready to proceed at the Isle of Wight, when several little accidents fell out to retard his progress; for he stay'd there some days for Sir Warham Sentleger, whose ship, the Thunder, by the negligence of her master, was at lee in the Thames: also after Ralegh was got to Plymouth, captain Pennington was not come to the Isle of Wight, and when he did arrive, was forced to ride back to London to engage the lady Ralegh to pass her word for the money which was to redeem the bread for his ship, amounting to thirty pounds, without which he could not have gone forward; nor could Sir John Ferne proceed till Ralegh had supply'd him with a hundred pounds by his cousin Herbert, and procur'd him another hundred pounds of his friend Dr. Sutcliffe, dean of Exeter, having furnish'd himself with a third hundred before he came from Wales. Ralegh tarried also for captain Whitney, who had a third part of his victuals to provide; and to assist him, Ralegh generously sold his plate at Plymouth, notwithstanding which, and Ralegh's having given him more countenance than any other of his officers, Whitney ran away from him at the Granadoes, and drew captain Woolaston with his ship after him: Ralegh had further the patience to wait ten or twelve days for captain Bayley, which he afterwards ungratefully requited by deserting also the fleet at the Canaries, for no apparent reason but Ralegh's refusing him a French shallop he took in the bay of Portugal; and yet after Ralegh had bought her for fifty crowns, that the French might have no cause of complaint, Bayley might have had her if he had desir'd it.<sup>i</sup>

<sup>a</sup> that time the king granted this commission he was, by Sir John Digby, treating a marriage between prince Charles and the Infanta of Spain, upon terms of two millions of money with her." But what put a stop to this match, may, in the same author, and others, be seen.

For these reasons he was forced to linger some months at Plymouth, losing thereby a fair wind, and indeed the season of the year. The mean while he publish'd in May following, such orders throughout his fleet, as gained him great applause, for the regularity and instruction they establish'd therein. A gentleman of his company, in a tract he wrote of this voyage, having express'd "how many ways Sir Walter Raleigh was moved to enterprizes of this nature "more than any other Englishman whatsoever; by his wisdom and learning, variety of conference, and experience of places he had formerly held; also how much greater his noble ends have been than any man's whatsoever of our nation who had attempted the like courses;" he proceeds "to the particular government of his fleet; which tho' others (says he) have in some measure observed, yet in all the great volumes which have been written, touching voyages, there is no precedent of so godly, severe and martial government; fit to be engraved in every man's soul that covets to do honour to his king and country in the like attempts:" then exhibits "a copy of the said laws, articles and commandments, which we at this present (says he) observe;" and of which, it may not therefore be unacceptable, hereunder to present the heads. <sup>a</sup>

Sets out for Guiana.

It was the end of June or the beginning of July, before all his company join'd him and he sail'd from Plymouth: then being encounter'd with a violent storm some eight leagues to the west of Scilly, in which captain Chidley's Pinnace was sunk, and captain King driven into Bristol, Raleigh held it, from experience as well as reason, the office of a commander of many ships, and those of different sailings and conditions, rather to take a port, and keep his fleet

<sup>a</sup> Bearing this title, Orders to be observed by the Commanders of the Fleet, and Land Companies, under the Charge and Conduct of Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, bound for the South Parts of America or elsewhere. Given at Plymouth in Devon, 3 May 1617. They first enjoin, That divine service should be read morning and evening, or, if interrupted by foul weather, once a day. That all swearing and blasphemy shall, after admonition, be fined. That no man refuse obeying his officer in all things commanded for the benefit of the journey, or refuse to wait his turn as directed, the sailors by the master and boatswain, the land men by their captains, lieutenants and others. Two captains of the watch in every ship to choose two soldiers every night to search between decks that no fire nor candle-light be carried about after the watch set, nor burning in any cabin without a lanthorn: Tobacco forbidden all men but upon the upper deck. Land men to learn the names and places of the ropes, to assist the sailors upon deck. Sailors to be trained as they do land men, so that all may be esteemed sailors or soldiers, as there is occasion: not to chase or board any ship without order of the general. To take nothing from any in league with his majesty; but, in extremity, to agree for the price. Every night to fall astern the general's ship and follow his light, and receive instructions of the course to be held, every morning. If separated by storms, to open their sealed billets, first on this side the North Cape if needful; secondly, at the South Cape; third, after 23 degrees; and fourth from the height of Cape de Vert. Upon discovering any sail at sea, either to windward or leeward of the admiral which he cannot discern, if she be large and single, to strike main top-sail and hoist it again so often as they judge it to be 100 tons burden, as if 200, to strike and hoist twice, &c. Upon discovering a small ship, to do the like with fore-top-sail; but if many great ships appear, both to strike the main-top sail often, and hang out the ensign in the main top. If they go large before wind, to stand as they do, till it may be judg'd the admiral had seen the said signs and standing. But if you went large at the discovery, to hale the sheets after a while, then go large again: so if they have their tacks aboard, and you yours aboard at the discovery, bear up a little and hale your sheet off again, to shew us what course they hold. If you discover a sail by night to windward of you, and you windward of the admiral, bear up to acquaint us: if you think you might speak with her, keep aloof, and fire a piece to give us knowledge. None to fire any ordnance but in discovering a sail by night, in danger of enemies, fire, or sinking. If you fire by day we shall know 'tis to make a ship strike, if by night we shall know you see more sail than your own; if you think we hear not, in a quarter of an hour fire again. If you are in present danger by a leak, shoot two pieces soon after one another; if by fire, three in like manner. In foul weather every ship to follow her sails to keep company with the rest, and not to run to far a head by day but it may fall astern the admiral at night. If attack'd by sea, the captain to appoint sufficient assistance to the gunner, and, if needful, the cabins between deck to be taken down; all beds and sacks employ'd for bulwarks. Musketeers of every ship to be divided under captains for the forecattle, the waist and the poop. Gunners not to shoot great ordnance at other distance than point blank: officers to see no loose powder be carried between decks near in stock, or match in hand. Hog-heads sawed in two, filled with water ready on the decks, and wet blankets against fire. Carpenters to be divided, in the hold and between decks, with leaden plates, plugs, &c. at hand. Proper numbers of sailors to be appointed to every sail under proper commanders: so that all knowing their charge and places, may do their duty without confusion or noise, none being to speak but the officers. No man to board a ship of the enemy without order. Every ship under lee of the enemy, must labour to recover the wind, if the admiral endeavour it; or if the enemy be to leeward, the whole fleet to follow the admiral or other leading ship within musket shot of the enemy, giving so much liberty to the leading ship after her broad-side deliver'd and her sail trim'd; then the second ship to give her side; so the third and fourth all taking as the first, and giving the enemy the other side, shall keep him under a perpetual volley: And thus to the windermost ship of the enemy, till it be batter'd to pieces or forced up to intangle the rest. If the admiral chace and is headmost, the next ship to take up his boat, unless otherwise ordered; the like to be done by those that follow other chasing ships. The divided Musketeers not to deliver their shot but at such distances as their commander directs. Ships to be kept clean between decks. Ordnance not cloy'd with trunks and chests. Provisions to be delivered to the steward. Apparel to be in cloak-bags, except some few chests that will not pester the ships. Fire-arms to be kept clean; if out of order, the officer to order the armorer to amend them. No feasting or drinking between meals; or drinking healths on the ship's provision. Every captain, by his purser or other officer, to take weekly accounts of the victuals. No candles to be delivered by the steward to any private man or private use. Whoever steals apparel, victuals, &c. to be punish'd as a thief and murderer. No man to strike any officer on pain of death: private men striking one another to be punish'd by court martial. Players at cards or dice for apparel, arms, &c. to be dismissed and made swabbers. Cowards upon any landing or otherwise, to be dismissed and made labourers to carry victuals for the rest. None to land in foreign parts without order from some chief commander; and where they land, none to force either christian or heathen women on pain of death. When landed in the Indies, not to eat meat unknown, and such not eaten by birds on the tree, or beasts under it. Not to sleep on the ground, or eat of flesh till fasted two or three hours. To swim in no river but where the Indians do, and to use them with civility. Other orders on the land to be establish'd by general consent when they should arrive there. A flag on the mast through of the admiral, was to be the signal for summoning the officers to council. See a tract call'd, Academy of Sir Walter Raleigh, &c. 4to 1618: from page 19 to 20 together, together, than to endanger the loss of his masts and rigging, or the advantage which enemies might take, or the loss of more time in attending another rendezvous, by the danger of a separation. Therefore he put into Ireland, and was oblig'd to stay seven weeks there: so that the winds only were to be accused now (as he observes) for their delay. And here, tho' by his credit he procur'd fifty oxen, which he distributed among his fleet, some of the crew spared not, at his return, to defame him with having taken care to revictual himself and none of the rest. On the 19th of August he set forward from Cork.<sup>a</sup>

WHEN he arriv'd at the isle of Lancerota, on the 6th of September, Raleigh sent a request to the governor, that he might be admitted to treat for some provisions: the governor sent back word, that he would confer with Raleigh himself, if he would come attended but by one gentleman, and armed only with their rapiers. Raleigh taking with him lieutenant Bradshaw met the governor, who agreed, that if he would send up an English factor, whose ship then rode in the road, whatever the island afforded should be deliver'd at a reasonable rate. Raleigh sent the factor, but the governor procrastinated, and at last sent word, that unless he would embark his men which lay on the sea shore, the islanders were so jealous they durst not divide from one another to supply him. Raleigh comply'd, but when half his men were got aboard, the islanders began to offer violence upon the rest. They slew one, and sent the factor to tell Raleigh they would part with nothing to him, for that they believed his company to be the Turkish fleet which had lately destroy'd Puerto Santo. The English hereupon would have gone and helped themselves, but Raleigh considering what displeasure it might give at home, how the merchants might suffer, and the poor English factor be ruin'd, complained to the governor of the Grand Canaries; of whom he also desired leave to take water undisturb'd; but instead of answer, when he landed some hundred men in the desert part of the island where they found fresh water, there ambush was laid, by which one of his men was wounded to death, and more had been slain had not captain Thornburst and lieutenant Hayman, two valiant gentlemen, seconded by Sir Warham Scutleger and young captain Raleigh, with half a dozen more, made forty of them run away. From this unavoidable fray, Bayley found pretence to turn tail and go home again.

IN want of water they sail'd to Gomera, one of the strongest and best defended of all these islands, and the best port. The Spaniards, being seated upon the very wash of the sea, roughly saluted the fleet at its first entrance with their cannon, and the English returned their salutation. But as soon as Raleigh recover'd the harbour, and commanded there should be no more firing, he sent a Spaniard he had with him, ashore, to assure the governor he had no intention to make war with any of the Spanish king's subjects; and if any harm had been done by his great ordnance to the town it was their fault, who, by shooting first, gave the occasion. The governor answer'd, he thought they had been the Turkish fleet aforesaid; but having been certified they were christians and Englishmen, and sought nothing but water, he was willing to let them take what they pleas'd, if he might be assur'd they would make no attempt upon the town-houses, or their gardens and fruits. Raleigh reply'd, that he would give him his faith, and the word of the king of Great Britain, his sovereign, that if the people of the town or island should lose so much as an orange or a grape by any one of his men without paying for it, he would hang him up in the market-place. And Raleigh kept his men in such good discipline, that the governor in divers letters (for he wrote to him every day) acknowledg'd how punctually Raleigh kept his faith with him, in regard to the inoffensive behaviour of his company; and also how much himself was beholden to him for his particular civilities. For his countess, who was of English extract, being a Stafford by the mother's side, and of the house of Horne by the father, having sent Raleigh some presents of fruit, sugar and rusks, he return'd others of greater value.<sup>b</sup> The earl moreover, gave him at his departure, on the 21st of September, a letter to Don Diego Sarmiento the Spanish ambassador in England, testifying how honourably Raleigh had comported himself to the Morisco's in these Canary Islands during the fourteen days that he was among them. Before he set sail, he discharg'd a bark of the Grand Canaries, taken by one of his pinnaces, coming from Cape Blanc in Africa; who complaining that his men had eaten of their fish to the value of six duckets, Raleigh gave them eight.

After having weather'd through a violent hurricane and some vast showers of rain, besides dangers no less fearful within; sickness now beginning to visit his ship, he arriv'd on the 2d of amber, ambergreece, a fine cut work rusk, a very excellent picture of Mary Magdalen, and a good quantity of red-seeds, which was of great value and esteem in these parts.

<sup>b</sup> And the presents Raleigh return'd to this governor, are not mentioned in his History, whence his properties are chiefly collected; I find, in his own Journal and of the presents, that they consisted of an excellent

of October at the isle of Bravo: and here also underwent great hazards and hardships; besides the sickness daily spreading among his men. For whereas all those who navigated even between Cape de Vert and America, were wont to pass between fifteen and twenty days at most, he found the wind so contrary to him, and indeed to nature, so many storms and showers, that he spent near six weeks in the passage from hence; by reason whereof, and the burning heat of the climate, he was in great distress for water. Here losing anchors, cables and water-cask, besides two more of his company,<sup>a</sup> he was driven after two days, by a kind of turnado, from this island; which, as well as the others he touch'd at, before mention'd, he has well describ'd in his Journal of this unfortunate voyage. After his return home, detraction did not spare to give out, that he went to Cape de Vert knowing it to be infected, and thereby lost many of his men; whereas he was a hundred and sixty leagues from that Cape, according to his own account, in his Apology; and had threescore men ill in his own ship before he came to Bravo, as we find it in his Journal; tho' if he had gone to that Cape now, after the rains which had fallen, there had been little danger of any such infection. All places that lie near great rivers, in low and moorish grounds, do indeed, as he rightly observes, subject their inhabitants to fevers and agues; as even along both sides of our own river Thames; and other infection is not found either in the Indies or in Africa, except when the easterly wind or breezes are excluded and kept off by some high mountains from the valleys, whereby the air wanting motion, stagnates, and becomes exceedingly unhealthful, as at Nombre de Dios, and some other places. But, says he, as good success admits of no examination, so the contrary allows of no excuse.<sup>b</sup>

Hence they proceeded, on the 4th of October, towards Guiana. But the sickness revisited and destroy'd many of those whom the storms spared, carrying off numbers of his ablest men both for sea and land, no less than forty-two of his own ship ending their voyage with their lives,<sup>c</sup> mostly in this month, at least before they reach'd the coast.<sup>d</sup> About the 12th of the same month, when their sickness began to be at the height, and they at the greatest distance from any shore, they were many other ways also distress'd; for when they began to be in scarcity of water, they were also becalm'd; yet ever threatened with extremity of tempestuous weather, from the strange and unusual alterations in the atmosphere. One while the horizon muffled as it were in such thick and fearful darkness, that they were forced to steer a day or two by candle-light. At other times, arched and overshot with gloomy discolorations; so that watery rainbows were continually invading their eyes, or heavy showers their bodies, and dead calms retarding their ships. Afterwards at Trinidad, Raleigh observed, besides two water-galls, no less than fifteen rainbows in one day, and one of them bent as it were both ends together, making a perfect circle; and these were ever followed with wet weather; for as he also noted, especially of the morning rainbow, it did not here produce a fair day, as in England.<sup>e</sup> But one good effect ensu'd, that when their water was so scarce, near the latter end of this month, that the ship's crew was reduced to half allowance, they saved some hogsheds, which fell from the clouds, and all quenched their thirst with great cans of this bitter draught, as Raleigh describes that rain water to have been. On the last day of this month, as he was raised abruptly out of his bed in a sweat, by the noise which a sudden great gust had occasion'd in his ship, he got a cold, which turned to a burning fever, and cast him down for twenty days together; in which time he receiv'd no other sustenance than a few stew'd prunes, but drink, every hour, both day and night; and sweated so excessively, that he was forced to shift three times every day, and as often at night.<sup>f</sup> At last the violence of his disease was abated, by the oranges and other fruits he had received at Gomera of the governor's lady; which he had carefully preserved in sand to his great refreshment; and without which, as he owns himself, he could not have lived:<sup>g</sup> But it was double the time before he could recover in any tolerable degree from this sharp visitation.

At Wiapoco.

In this slow and sickly manner they arriv'd at last, on the 11th of November, at the north cape of Wiapoco. And here Raleigh sent for his old servant Leonard, the Indian, who had been in England three or four years with him ; but he was removed so far up in the country, there was no pursuing him. <sup>a</sup> Therefore he stood away for Caliana, which is in 5 degrees, on the coast of Guiana, at the first discovery call'd Port Howard, <sup>b</sup> where the cassique was also his servant, and had lived with him in the Tower of London two years. There he arrived in a day or two, having passed the island noted for its multitude of birds and silk-bearing trees, and from thence sent for his servant Harry, the Indian, who, with other cassiques, came and brought him great store of Cassavi bread and roasted mullets, with plantanes, pinas, pistacias, &c. But Ralegh ventured not to eat of the pinas, which tempted him exceedingly, till after a day or two's airing on the shore in a tent which was there pitch'd for him ; then he also eat some armadillo and a little pork, and began to gather strength. Here also he landed his sick men, and recovered many ; and here he buried captain Edward Hastings (the lord Huntington's brother) who died ten days or more before, and with him his serjeant major, Hart, and captain Henry Snedale ; the charge of whose ship Ralegh gave to his servant captain Robert Smith of Cornwall. <sup>c</sup> Here he also set up his barges and shallops which they brought from England, in quarters, cleansed his ships, trim'd up his cask, and supply'd them with water ; fix'd up a forge, and made such iron works as they wanted. Thus on that shore, and this river they employed and refresh'd themselves for about three weeks ; during which time, Ralegh was very much caref'd by the Indians of his old acquaintance aforesaid, and the other natives of this place, who cherished him daily with the best provisions that the country yielded, and offer'd him all kind of obedience, even to the making him their sovereign prince and ruler, if he would abide and settle among them ; so fresh continued his memory, and such unanimous impressions of homage and respect had his former behaviour still left upon them ; which offer he mentions with the greatest modesty and indifference in the dispatch he now sent to England. For in this interval, captain Peter Alley, one of his company, who was much troubled with a vertiginous disorder in his head, having got leave to return home, and the opportunity of a Dutch vessel which lay there, Ralegh among other letters, sent one by him to his lady, dated from Caliana the 14th of November. Herein, says he, " I cannot write to you but with a weak hand, for I have suffer'd the most violent calenture for fifteen days that ever man did, and lived ; but God that gave me a strong heart in all my adversities, has also now strengthened me in the hell-fire of heat. We have had two most grievous sicknesses in our ship, of which forty-two have died, and there are yet many sick ; but having recover'd the land of Guiana this 12th of November, I hope we shall recover them. We are yet two hundred men, and the rest of our fleet are reasonably strong, strong enough I hope to perform what we have undertaken, if the diligent care at London to make our strength known to the Spanish king by his ambassador, has not taught the Spanish king to fortify all the entrances against us. Howsoever, we must make the adventure, and if we perish, it shall be no honour for England, nor gain for his majesty, to lose, among many others, an hundred as valiant gentlemen as England hath in it." Then having spoken of Bayley's running away from him, the unnatural weather they had laboured through, and their tedious passage, with the present of fruits which had so much relieved him, as is before observed, besides the death of some principal officers, and recommendation of himself to some friends in London, especially his son Carew, he concludes thus : " To tell you that I might be here king of the Indians were a vanity ; but my name hath still lived among them ; here they feed me with fresh meat, and all that the country yields : all offer to obey me." <sup>d</sup> At this time also, a gentleman of his company having drawn up a discourse in praise of Guiana, and in honour of this adventure ; especially of the principal discoverer Ralegh himself, it being dated from Caliana November the 17th, sent it also into England by the same bearer ; <sup>e</sup> and it was printed the following year. <sup>f</sup>

and had it not been fair weather, would never have got off the coast, having not above two fathom of water. Here, after a few days, when all the fleet was gather'd together, it being consider'd in a general consultation, that Raleigh himself who had grappled with the sickness for six weeks, and was now rather so much relaps'd than recover'd, that he could not move otherwise than as he was carried in a chair, * they resolv'd that there was no thoughts of his undertaking the passage up the Orenoque in person. And further, tho' they could never understand by Keymis, who was the first of any nation that had enter'd the main mouth of that river, nor by any of their mariners, who had traded there many years for tobacco, what certainty the water was of; yet having found by experience, that ships at eleven foot water, lay aground three days in passing up; therefore there was no attempting it with Raleigh's ship, which being heavier, and charged with near forty pieces of ordnance, drew seventeen foot. Nor would his son with the rest have ventured, with the provisions they had, through any other person's assurance or resolution of staying to relieve them at a place appointed, against the forces expected to approach, but that of his father and their general. <sup>b</sup> So it was resolv'd by all, that the five larger ships should ride at Punta de Gallo in Trinidad under Raleigh, to secure their retreat, and the five lesser (for this was now the whole number of his fleet) with five or six foot companies of fifty men each, should enter the river. According to this determination, the fleet was here divided; that is to say, captain Whitney in the Encounter; Woolaston in the Confidence; King in the Supply; Smith in a Pink, and Hall in a Carvel. The companies had for their leaders, captain Charles Parker, and captain North (brothers to the lord Mounteagle and the lord North;) young Raleigh; captain Thornburst of Kent; captain Pennington's lieutenant, who seems to be another Hall, and captain Chidley's lieutenant, Prideux. Sir Warham St. Leger, Raleigh's lieutenant, who had the charge of these companies, fell sick at Caliana; so it was confer'd on George Raleigh, Sir Walter's nephew, who had served with great commendation in the Low Countries; and captain Keymis had the chief charge for their guidance and landing within the river. <sup>c</sup> But Keymis having laid down the plan of his intended attempt upon the mine, and undertaken to discover it with six or eight persons in Sir John Ferne's shallop, Raleigh, upon consideration, disliking that method of procedure, determined to alter it, and therefore gave him his instructions in the following words.

Divides his fleet at the Triangle Islands.

His Instructions to Keymis.

“ Keymis, Whereas you were resolv'd, after your arrival into the Oronoque, to pass to the mine with my cousin Herbert and six musketers, and to that end desired to have Sir John Ferne's shallop; I do not allow of that course; because you cannot land so secretly, but that some Indians on the river side may discover you, who giving knowledge thereof to the Spaniard, you may be cut off before you recover your boat. I therefore advise you to suffer the captains and companies of the English to pass up westward of the mountain Aio, from whence you have no less than three miles to the mine, and to encamp between the Spanish town and you, if there is any town near it; that being so secured, you may make trial what depth and breadth the mine holds, and whether or no it will answer our hopes. And if you find it royal, and the Spaniards begin to war upon you, then let the serjeant-major repell them, if it is in his power, and drive them as far as he can: but if you find the mine is not so rich as to persuade the holding of it, and it requires a second supply, then shall you bring but a basket or two to satisfy his majesty that my design was not imaginary but true, tho' not answerable to his majesty's expectation; for the quantity of which I never gave assurance, nor could. On the other side, if you shall find any great number of soldiers are newly sent into the Orenoque, as the cassique of Caliana told us there were, and that the passages are already enforc'd, so as without manifest peril of my son, yourself and the other captains, you cannot pass towards the mine; then be well advised how you land, for I know (that a few gentlemen excepted) what a scum of men you have, and I would not for all the world, receive a blow from the Spaniard to the dishonour of the nation. I myself, for my weakness, cannot be present, neither will the company land except I abide by the ships, the galleons of Spain being daily expected. Piggot the serjeant-major is dead, Sir Warham St. Leger, my lieutenant, without hope of life, and my nephew, George Raleigh, your serjeant-major, now, but a young man: it is therefore on your judgment that I rely; who, I trust, God will direct for the best. Let me hear from you as soon as you can. You shall find me at Punta de Gallo dead or alive; and if you find not my ships there, yet there you shall find their ashes; for I will fire with the galleons if it come to extremity, but run away I will never.” <sup>d</sup>

WITH these instructions those five ships set forward, parting from Raleigh and the rest of the fleet at the islands aforesaid, with a month's provision, on the 10th of December.<sup>a</sup> But when they found a new Spanish town, call'd St. Thome, consisting of about 140 houses; tho' lightly built, with a chapel, a convent of Franciscans, and a garrison erected on the main channel of the Orenoque,<sup>b</sup> about twenty miles distant from the place where Antonio Berreo, the governor taken by Raleigh in his first discovery and conquest here, attempted to plant; Keymis and the rest thought themselves oblig'd, through fear of leaving the enemy's garrison between them and their boats, to deviate from their instructions, which enjoin'd them, first to carry a little party to make trial of the mine, under a shelter of their own camp; and then to deal with the Spanish town as it should give cause, by permitting or offering to prevent them. So they concluded to land in one body, and encamp between the mine and the town;<sup>c</sup> whereby, tho' themselves were something stronger, their boats were subject to the same exposure, and the mine left untry'd contrary to Raleigh's order. For, about three weeks after their departure, landing, by night, it seems, nearer the town than they suspected, and meaning to rest themselves on the river-side till morning, they were, in the night-time, set upon by the Spanish troops, appriz'd of, and fore-arm'd for their coming, as we shall see. This charge was so unexpected, and struck the common soldiers with such amazement and confusion, that had not the captains and some other valiant gentlemen made head, and animated the rest, they had all been cut to pieces. But the rest, by their example, soon rallying, made such a vigorous defence against the Spaniards, that they drove them to a retreat, till in the warmth of their pursuit, the English found themselves at the Spanish town before they knew where they were. Here the battle was renewed afresh upon them, being assaulted by the governor himself Don Diego Palameca, and four or five captains at the head of their companies; against whom, captain Walter Raleigh, a brave and sprightly young man, now twenty-three years of age, but fonder of glory than safety, not tarrying for the musketers, rush'd foremost, at the head of a company of pikes, and having killed one of the Spanish captains, was himself shot by another; but pressing still forward, with his sword upon Erinetta, probably the captain who had shot him, this Spaniard with the butt-end of his musket fell'd him to the ground, and after these words, Lord have mercy upon me, and prosper your enterprize, young Raleigh spoke no more. Hereupon John Plessington, his serjeant, thrust the said Spanish captain through the body with his halbert. Two<sup>d</sup> Spaniards more of the Spaniards were at the same time slain, one by John of Morocco, another of young Raleigh's company: and lastly the governor himself also lost his life in the said engagement;<sup>e</sup> which happen'd, as Camden reckons, the second of January.<sup>f</sup> The leaders being thus all dispatch'd, and many of their soldiers, the rest fled and were disper'd, some to shelter about the market-place, from whence they kill'd and wounded the English at pleasure; so as they saw no way left to be safe, but by firing the town about their ears, and driving them to the woods and mountains, whence they still keep the English waking with perpetual alarms.<sup>g</sup> Others were more careful to defend the passages to their mines, of which they had three or four not far distant, than they had been to defend the town itself.<sup>h</sup> But for the magazine of tobacco, which one writer, among other erroneous representations of this voyage, thought might countervail the charge of it, could it with some other things have been preserved,<sup>i</sup> it seems not to have been consumed by the English; because Raleigh had enough thereof soon after to have paid for the victualling of his fleet, if there had been occasion, as himself has related.<sup>j</sup>

ALL obstructions seeming thus removed, captain Keymis had now a fair opportunity to make what trial he pleas'd at the mine; and that he did attempt the discovery will appear by the consequence, as his preparations do in the letter he wrote to Raleigh six days after the action aforesaid, tho' it came not long after to his hands. Herein having open'd in as gradual and discreet a manner as he could, how gallantly his son fell in this exploit, and observed, that if

As if Raleigh was at so much toil, hazard and expence only to break the peace, and drive a pack of poor Spaniards out of a worthless town. Nor does it seem likely, that if young Raleigh knew this to be his father's secret, that he would thus disclose it; but rather if he did utter such an expression, that he suddenly invented it to give his men hopes of booty, knowing that would best excite them to bravery.

At Punta de Gallo.

INDEED Raleigh had need of those prayers, on his own part, at this time, not only in his sickness, but even in the intervals he had of recovery ; for here to give some account of him in this time of their separation, we may observe, that he lay with the five larger ships under himself, captain John Pennington, his vice-admiral, one of the most sufficient gentlemen for the sea, that England has, says he ; Sir Warham St. Leger, another valiant and worthy gentleman, Sir John Ferne, and captain Chidley of Devon, <sup>b</sup> mostly at Punta de Gallo, and other ports about Trinidad, no less than a hundred and fifty miles from the rest of his fleet, making the adventure up the Oronoque, yet in daily apprehensions of meeting with the Spanish armadas sent purposely to lay wait for and destroy him ; which it would probably have done, after the great sickness which had so much weakned his men, and under this disadvantageous division of his ships, but that the enemy luckily waited for him in a wrong place. Besides, it having been falsely rumour'd in his fleet, that he brought out of England twenty-two thousand broad-pieces of gold with him, some of his crew traiterously conspir'd to sail away, while he was gone ashore in his barge, to take views and make discoveries of the country, <sup>c</sup> which he was sometimes wont to do, as at Terra de Brea, or the Pitch-land, as he calls it, from the bitumenous substance which so remarkably issues there, as he has well describ'd ; and when he travers'd some woods to seek the trees that yield that precious balsam whereof he got a small quantity, which smelt like angelica ; <sup>d</sup> so to have left him a prey to famine, wild beasts, or the no less unmerciful Spaniards, by whom he might have been flea'd alive, as other Englishmen, who came but to traffick, had formerly been. Add to this the many provocations he received from the Spaniards who were in any of the ports where his men landed, only to exchange a few commodities for tobacco or other products of the country, not only by the most opprobrious language, but discharging sometimes a volley of twenty muskets at a time upon them, whereby Sir John Ferne had some of his men kill'd. <sup>e</sup> And lastly, the uneasiness he was continually in, that he could hear no tidings of the rest of his fleet thus detach'd upon the adventure. And tho' some Indian spies were brought to him in the beginning of February, by one of whom, who could speak the Spanish tongue, he was first inform'd, that the English in Oronoque were reported, by some Tivitivas he had spoken with, to have taken St. Thome and slain Diego de Palameca the governor, with captain Erinetta, and captain John Rues ; that the rest fled, and that two English captains were likewise kill'd : Tho' the same was soon after also asserted, with other particulars, by another Indian ; yet Raleigh would not set them down, till he knew the truth ; which afterwards endeavouring to compass of other Indians, said to have been at the taking of that town, whom he sent in pursuit of, they escaped, and he was not certified in the report, even near the middle of this month, for so far his own Journal extends. <sup>f</sup>

In the mean while Keymis made an attempt for the mine, and had set forward with captain Thornburst, Mr. W. Herbert, Sir John Hamden and others ; but at their first approach, near the bank where they intended to land, he received, from an ambuscade of Spaniards in the woods (who had probably gather'd there with expectation of his coming that way to the mine) a volley of shot, which slew two of his company, hurt six others, and wounded captain Thornburst so dangerously in the head, that he languish'd thereof three months after. <sup>g</sup> This blow first stagger'd the resolution of Keymis, who then, as he reflected more upon the state of their condition, was more over-power'd with doubts and discouragements ; insomuch that tho' tho' written mostly on one side, only with intention perhaps of enlarging some of the particulars afterwards, seems incomplete both at the beginning and the end : for it begins but at the 19th of August, when he set sail from Cork, and ends at the 13th of February 1617, before the rest of his fleet returned to him from the Oronoque. It is preserved in the Cottonian library, under Titus, B. VIII.

the English under him might have been informed of two or three mines more, besides this which Keymis had undertaken to lead them to, by a Mulatto, who had waited on the late governor in his chamber, and, as he has written in his letter beforemention'd, knew all things that concern'd his master.<sup>a</sup> This servant, afterwards, by no other means than courteous usage, discover'd the same to Raleigh himself; and not only the places where those mines lay, but more particularly, that two of them, gold ones, were in the possession of Don Pedro Rodrigo de Parama, and Hermian Frontino; and a silver one, in the possession of Francisco Fasardo; and that the cause of their remaining unwrought was, that they wanted Negroes to work them: for, by a law of Charles the emperor, the Indians could not be constrain'd, and the Spaniards neither would nor could endure the labour.<sup>b</sup> Yet did the English now decline all endeavour, either to be directed to these, tho' but few miles distant from the town, or proceed to possess that which Keymis was to conduct them to, tho' within a few hours march. Nay, when the ships were upon their return, and they had sailed down the river as far as the country of Carapana, one of the natural lords, who had reserved that part of Guiana to the late queen; and, having heard that the English had abandon'd St. Thome, and left no forces, as he hop'd they would have done, had sent a great canoo, laden with store of fruits and provisions, to the captains; also by one of his men, who had learn'd the Spanish tongue during his long slavery under the Spaniards, had offer'd them a rich gold mine in his own country, to engage their stay; further proffering to leave sufficient pledge for any English person they should send to examine it; and, when captain Leak with another of the company, named Molineux, offer'd themselves to go, the greater part nevertheless refus'd to suffer them. This declension of his offer, so heightned Carapana's desire to make it acceptable, that he sent again, leaving one of his men still aboard, who entreated to detain them but two days, and Carapana would himself, aged as he was, bring them a sample of the ore; who, tho' still rejected, and the ships under sail, yet sent once more a boat after them up to the mouth of the river, in hopes to the very last of retrieving them, as the said captain Leak, Parker, Molineux, and half a dozen officers more, are, by Raleigh, nominated to attest.<sup>c</sup> But the adventurers, among other dissuasives from all temptation to continue there any longer, harbour'd a notion that the Spaniards had secretly agreed with, and employ'd those Indians only to trepan the English; which appear'd but a weak and ill-grounded apprehension to Raleigh; for such treachery might have been easily prevented, had they waited the arrival of the old Indian chief, who would have brought the ore to their very ships. And what advantage in betraying them, says he, could there be, when the Guianians offered to leave hostages, six for one? Moreover, one of the Indians, whom the English found in fetters when they took St. Thome, and brought with them aboard, could have told them, that the very cassique, who sent to shew them the gold mine in his country, was unconquer'd and at enmity with the Spaniard; and could have assur'd them withal, that such mines were in that country possess'd by the said cassique.<sup>d</sup> But no intreaty or invitation would retain them, and so they return'd, about the middle of February, to Punta de Gallo, after the fleet had been thus divided, and they absent above two months from Sir Walter Raleigh, as himself has informed us;<sup>e</sup> whereby it appears, that the fleet united at, or very soon after, the time he discontinued his Journal; and it appears no-where in that Journal, that any inhuman offer was made to remove from Punta de Gallo to the Charibes, many leagues off, where he knew famine must over-take the land soldiers before they could over-take him, as his enemies suggested: <sup>f</sup> besides, he cleared himself in such a solemn manner of this aspersions at his death, as leaves not the least stain of cruelty any where but upon their characters who slander'd him with it.<sup>g</sup>

'Tis possible that Keymis might, at his first return, be favourably received, and as familiarly admitted to Raleigh's table as before; <sup>h</sup> for a disappointment of this consequence was not to be too readily broach'd on one side, nor reprehended on the other. Besides, as some mitigation of their ill success, and inducement to further hopes, Keymis produced two ingots of gold which had been reserved at St. Thome, as the king of Spain's quinto, or proportion; together with several other valuable spoils of the governor.<sup>i</sup> Keymis also brought with him a large quantity quantity of papers, letters, memorials, schemes, plans and maps found in the said governor's study; which gave some singular lights into the state and condition of Spain, with respect to many of the American plantations. Among these papers were found four letters, which plainly discover'd, not only Raleigh's whole enterprize to have been betray'd, but his life thereby put into the power of the Spaniards themselves; and by whom, even to the breaking of that peace, if any was broken, for which he was afterwards exclaim'd against. Raleigh himself has related: <sup>b</sup> for he thought this such black and cruel usage, that he forbore not, in a letter which he wrote, about a month after this time, from the isle of St. Christopher's, to Sir Ralph Winwood, the secretary of state, to shew his sense of it in these words: "It pleased his majesty to value us at so little, as to command me, upon my allegiance, to set down under my hand, the country and the very river by which I was to enter it; to set down the number of my men, and burden of my ships, and what ordnance every ship carried; which being made known to the Spanish ambassador, and by him sent to the king of Spain, a dispatch was made and letters sent from Madrid before my departure out of the Thames." <sup>c</sup> By the contents of those Spanish letters it further appears, that three hundred Spanish soldiers, and ten pieces of ordnance, were commissioned to be sent from their respective garrisons against the adventurers up the Orenoque; that is, a hundred and fifty men from Nuevo Reyno de Granada, under the command of captain Antonio Musica; and another hundred and fifty from Puerto Rico, to be conducted under Francisco Zanchio. There was also prepared an armada by sea, to set upon Raleigh himself and the ships with him; "by which, says he, we had not only been torn to pieces, but all those in the river had also perished, they being of no force for the sea fight; for we had resolved to have burnt by their sides, and to have died there, had the armada arriv'd; but, belike, they stay'd for us at Margarita, by which they knew we must pass towards the Indies." In another letter, which he wrote the next day from the same island to his wife, Raleigh says, "Never was poor man exposed to slaughter as I was." Then having related the particulars of the forces beforemention'd, sent to destroy him, through the communication of his scheme to the court of Spain by the Spanish ambassador, he concludes this part with these words: "It were too long to tell you how we were preserved; if I live, I shall make it known."<sup>d</sup>

BUT the indignation which Raleigh must have conceived at the sight of these letters, was not a little heightened, when he came to hear that Keymis had made no actual trial at the mine, and the reasons he gave for having relinquish'd it. He alledg'd indeed, that after the fallay of the Spaniards upon them from the woody banks, which had disabled several of his men at their first attempt to land, he began to consider, they had not then able men enough left to work the mine; tho' indeed, it lay not so deep, as to need all those pioneers and implements, which, in king James's Declaration, Raleigh is objected against for not carrying with him, as may appear by the first discovery of this mine, in the former part of these sheets. Keymis also argued, they had not men enough to keep this mine, tho' they should escape further danger in the difficult passage to it, which he feared much they should not; the Spaniards being more careful to preserve it, as was said, than the town; and the ways to it, Aspera y Fragosa, as Raleigh has observed; agreeable to that infertility and unaptness for cultivation, which Acosta and other naturalists, have describ'd in those grounds which are impregnate with such treasures. Keymis urged further, that they wanted sufficient provisions for the number remaining, having been much longer up the page, with its virtues and value, performed several notable cures thereby, and at last made an acceptable present of it to Sir Henry Wotton, then provost of Eton-College, who was troubled with one, or both of those infirmities. See the earl of Cork's Letter to Sir Henry Wotton, in Reliquie Wottonianæ, 12mo. 1651, p. 497.

<sup>a</sup> The king of Spain's first letter, sent to Guiana by a bark of Avila, to arm the Indians against Raleigh's coming, was dated 19 March 1616, at Madrid (which letter, says Raleigh, in his to Sir Ralph Winwood, I have, here enclosed, sent you, the rest I reserve; not knowing whether they may be intercepted or not). The second of that king's was dated 2d of May 1617, sent also by a caravel to Diego de Palameca, governor of Guiana, El Dorado and Trinidad. The third of his majesty's, was sent by the bishop of Puerto Rico, and delivered to that governor the 15th of July following; and the fourth was sent from the farmer and secretary of his customs in the Indies at the same time. Thus Raleigh's letter to Winwood (from St. Christopher's) in his Remains (last edition) p. 172. compared with some manuscript copies of it in the Harleian library, &c. Others tell us, these advertisements and preparations were the cause of all the resistance that was made at St. Thome; that Raleigh's whole design, under his own hand, was delivered by king James to Gondomar; and that his own letter (thereof to king James) was found in the governor of St. Thome's closet; which letter he brought back, and shewed to the lords of the council. See Observations on Sanderfon's History, p. 13. Thus also in the State-Trials, vol. 1. p. 219; and in Dr. Wetwood's Memoirs, it is said, Raleigh's plan, which king James promised to keep secret, was sent by Gondomar to Spain, and thence to the Indies, before Raleigh left the Thames; and the very original paper was found in the Spanish governor's closet.

<sup>b</sup> Tho' Raleigh has charged this matter of betraying him to the Spaniards in plain terms, both in his letter to the secretary of state, which follows as above, and in his Apology; one, or both of which king James had certainly read, it is yet observable, that this topic is not so much as touch'd upon in his majesty's Declaration, but entirely sunk in silence.

river than they expected; and that they could not carry enough from the town up the mountain, their company being divided, the greater part, in the town itself, and those too weak to defend it. That he further found all regard to order and obedience broke through, as soon as captain Raleigh was dead; and feared the fatal news of his death, would either not find his sick father alive, or hasten his end: that to attempt the discovery, and fail through any of these discouragements, he thought would be more detrimental than wholly at this time to decline it: that to discover it for a pack of profligates and mutineers, was more than they deserv'd; and to discover it for Raleigh himself, not likely to live, and unpardon'd, was, as whisper'd in the company, for a man non ens in the law. Above all that, it would therefore be a greater error to find it for the Spaniards, than to pretend it could no where be found. Lastly, that these arguments, approved of by the majority, were confirmed by the alarm they received at the discovery of the letters (afore said) in the governor's closet; whereby they were led, every moment, to expect a fresh enforcement of the enemy against them from each end of the river; therefore separate as the fleet was, and not able to make resistance, they all agreed to return.<sup>a</sup>

HOWEVER specious these arguments, or some of them, might be, Raleigh was in no-wise pacified with them. He utterly disavowed the whole conduct of Keymis before several of his company, and the ignorance he had pretended to them; told him, that a blind man might have found the place, by the marks and directions himself had set down under his own hand; and that his care of losing more men in passing the woods was but feigned; for, after his son's death, it was known he had no care for any man surviving, and therefore, had he brought home but one hundred weight of ore, tho' with the loss of as many men, it would have given the king satisfaction, preserved his reputation, and encouraged a return the next year, with greater force, to have held the country for his majesty, to whom it belong'd; for the riches and fruitfulness whereof, himself had formerly so largely attested.<sup>c</sup> But since he had suffered his wilfulness, in spite of his knowledge, to defeat their whole undertaking, he should indeed be glad if Keymis could make those reasons, for not opening the mine, passable with the state, but that he himself could not justify the neglect. Keymis grew deeply discontented hereat, and continued so several days. "Afterwards he came to me in my cabin (says Raleigh) and shewed me a letter he had written to the earl of Arundel, excusing himself for not discovering of the mine, using the same arguments, and many others, which he had done before; and prayed me to allow thereof." But Raleigh, no way satisfied, declared, that as Keymis could plead no ignorance, he could admit of no excuse, being wounded in his credit with the king past all recovery, and that this could admit of no reparation. Keymis, seeing Raleigh resolved not to favour his folly, retir'd as one knowing not what course to take, yet expressing, perhaps, also some design of giving further satisfaction; "and went out of my cabin into his own," says Raleigh, where having shut himself in, Raleigh soon after heard a pistol go off, and sending up to know who discharg'd it, Keymis made answer, he fir'd it himself, because it had been long charg'd. About half an hour after, his boy going into his cabin, found him dead, with much blood by him, having a long knife thrust through his left pap into his heart, and his pistol lying by him; with which it appear'd, that he had shot himself, but the bullet being small, and having only crack'd a rib, he dispatch'd effectually with the knife.<sup>d</sup> And this, as I compute, happen'd about the latter end of February afore said, or perhaps the former part of March, because Raleigh mentions it in the letters he wrote this month into England, before refer'd to; therefore the death of Keymis could not happen in the following summer, as one author mistakes.<sup>e</sup> And whereas some had given it out, that Keymis slew himself through remorse that he had seduced and deluded so many gentlemen with an imaginary mine, Raleigh will not allow that to have been the cause; but ascribes it entirely to his own positive and passionate temper, and says, that "he would not have laid violent hands on himself for any telling of tales, as Sanderfon and other prejudiced writers have maliciously insinuated. The Observer on his History of king James, calls it a bale aspersiō; and Sanderfon, in his Answer, instead of producing any authority in his own justification, is for meddling no further with it; so refers to his History, as a matter too large to be interred again. But what entirely clears the affair, is king James's Declaration; for had there been the least shadow of suspicion that Raleigh had been any way concerned in Keymis's untimely end, we may be well persuaded, that Declaration would not have been silent thereof, which has amass'd and aggravated to many frivolous circumstances in this voyage against him.

“man’s opinion; nor when he did, adds Raleigh, could he have said unto me, that he was ignorant of the place, and knew of no such mine; for what cause had I then to have rejected his excuses, or to have laid his obstinacy to his charge?” Further urging, “that several captains,” whom Raleigh names, “might be put to their oaths, whether or no, Keymis did not confess to them, coming down the river, at a place where they cast anchor, that he could, from thence, have gone to the mine in two hours.”<sup>a</sup>

At St. Christopher’s

AFTER this accident it was determined, in a council of the officers, to make for Newfoundland, to repair and refresh their ships; but before, as well as after, they arriv’d there, great disorders arose: some took to courses of their own head, and ran away from him, as was before-mention’d; and many others proved so refractory and ungovernable, that, when he came to the isle of St. Christopher’s, he was forced, under the conduct of his cousin, Mr. Herbert, to ship them home. Of whom, tho’ he had shewed some uncommon generosity to some of them, he says, in the letter he wrote from thence to his wife on the 22d of March, “I know they will not spare to wound me;” and further declares, “There is never a base slave in all the fleet that hath taken the pains and care that I have done; that hath slept so little, and travell’d so much: my friends will not believe them, and for the rest I care not.”<sup>b</sup> In another letter he sent from hence at the same time to Sir Ralph Winwood, he writes to the same sense, and further adds: “But these being gone, I shall, says he, be able, if I live, to keep the sea till the end of August, with some four reasonable good ships;” for to that number was his fleet now reduced. By the time here propos’d of continuing at sea, there might have now been thoughts of some course to qualify the misadventure of the mine, and enable them to re-attempt it; perhaps by some little trading voyages: but how probable that he should design any thing so far as the East Indies, or that with such small force he intended to go for the western islands, to attack the Mexico fleet, and surprise the carracks, as in the king’s Declaration is laid to Raleigh’s charge,<sup>d</sup> we shall leave for others to decide. ’Tis plain that nothing of this was put in practice; for when they came to Newfoundland, the company in his own ship fell to mutiny, and those who were for staying abroad, whom Wilson calls the major part, made Raleigh take an oath, says he, not to go home but by their allowance.<sup>e</sup> But the Declaration says, that the greater number were for returning to England; and that Raleigh getting on the sea bank, put it to the question; whereupon the voices divided starboard and larboard; and that when he perceived the greater number vote for their return, he went to that side and voted so too;<sup>f</sup> but manifestly to the hazard of his life was his voting on either side.<sup>g</sup> In the same Declaration we are further led to believe, he afterwards “offer’d his own ship, which was of great value, to his company, if they would only set him aboard a French bark, and that he made the same offer to some of his officers, when he was come back to Ireland, as not knowing how things would be construed, and being loth to put his head under the king’s girdle;”<sup>h</sup> but he did, and we shall see the consequence of it.

At Newfoundland.

By the time that Raleigh arrived on the coast of Ireland, the sacking of St. Thome, the firing of the town, and the slaughter of the Spaniards to the number of four or five hundred men, were largely descanted on by his enemies, as by his friends were his own more particular misfortunes in the long and dangerous sickness he had endured; his disappointment in the mine; the consumption of so much treasure; the loss of his gallant son; the violent end of his old servant captain Keymis; and above all, the general disorder, defection, and dispersion of his whole fleet. All together, it became not so much a national as a universal topic of discourse and attention; every one censuring or commiserating as their interest or affections mov’d. It is remember’d, by Camden, that captain John North, brother to the lord North, a valiant gentleman, and who was much esteemed by Raleigh for his faithful conduct under him throughout this voyage, was the first who related the deplorable news of this unfortunate expedition to king James, on the 13th of May, 1618.<sup>i</sup> He seems to have done it in a very just and pathetical manner; and it might have had a good effect, had that king’s pity been as easily touch’d as his fear. Among authors, some, who had been for registering this commission of king James with that granted by Alphonso king of Naples to Bertram his captive Moor, whom he entrusted both with his liberty, and a large sum of money to buy him some fine horses in Barbary, for which his jester gave him a prime place in his fool's chronicle; were now, upon the expectation of a return, ready, with the same jester, to blot out the king, and enroll the captive for a fool: but others look'd upon this action of Ralegh's in a nobler and more elevated light, and as what, for the integrity of acquitting his fiduciary pledges, was rather to be compared with the generous act of that brave Roman consul, Attilius Regulus; who, to keep his promise and his faith, returned to his enemies, the Carthaginians, under whom he had been a prisoner; tho' he knew that he went to inevitable death.<sup>a</sup>

AND now the Spanish ambassador having, by special advertisements, gain'd the earliest intelligence of all that had passed at Guiana; and how, among the rest, his own kinsman, the governor, had been slain, broke into the king's presence in a turbulent manner, and bawling out for his majesty's audience, only of one word, assaulted him with the abrupt and repeated exclamation of Piratas! Piratas! Piratas! At last he found breath and words to enlarge upon the matter so effectually, as what tended not only to the infringement of his majesty's promise, but that happy union between the two crowns in their royal progeny, now the match between prince Charles and Dona Maria, with all the advantages it was pregnant with, was in such a hopeful degree of maturity, even to the involving of both nations in the most durable and dreadful hostilities, that the pacific king of Great Britain was ready to do any thing in the world to appease him, and hush it up. To this purpose, his royal proclamation was forthwith published on the 11th of June; setting forth, that "Whereas we gave liberty to Sir Walter Ralegh and others, to undertake a voyage to Guiana, where they had pretended a probability of discovering gold mines, &c. We did, by express limitation and caution, restrain and forbid them from attempting any act of hostility upon any territories or subjects of foreign princes with whom we are in amity; and more particularly, those of our dear brother the king of Spain, in respect of his dominions in that continent, which, notwithstanding, they have, by hostile invasion of the town of St. Thome, &c. broken and infring'd. We have therefore held fit to make publick declaration of our utter dislike and detestation of the said insolencies; and for the better detection and clearing up of the truth, we charge all our subjects, that have any understanding or notice thereof, to repair to any of our privy council, and make known their whole knowledge, that we may thereupon proceed to the exemplary punishment and coercion of all such as are found guilty of so scandalous and enormous outrages."<sup>b</sup>

THE next thing to be thought of was, a proper and plausible instrument for the apprehension of Sir Walter Ralegh when he should come ashore; such a one was Sir Lewis Stucley soon found to be (and not Sir John, as one writer erroneously christens him<sup>c</sup>) who was vice-admiral of Devon (not lieutenant of the Tower, as the same negligent author mistakes again.) One who, tho' Ralegh's countryman, and, as all others but Stucley say, his kinsman too, yet most officiously undertook that charge, through the sordid prospect of profit; "so unnatural," says Wilson, and servile is the spirit when it hath an allay of baseness; there being many others fitter for that employment."<sup>d</sup> However, his orders were to bring up this great malefactor in a fair and courteous manner, according to his majesty's gracious and mild course, as it is call'd in his Declaration. And tho' we are told, by one, otherwise misguided in his account of this expedition, by some distorted representations of it in those times, "That the world much wonder'd, so great a wise man as Sir Walter Ralegh, would return to cast himself upon so inevitable a rock as it was fear'd he would;"<sup>e</sup> nevertheless, as we are assured, by captain Samuel King, an old officer of Ralegh's, who bore him company all this while, and has left us a particular Narrative of whatsoever occur'd in their journey from their landing now at Plymouth, to their final arrival at London, that he no sooner put into the harbour, and heard of the proclamation aforesaid against him, than he resolved to surrender himself voluntarily into his majesty's hands; and to that intent, both moor'd his ship and sent his sails ashore the first day he landed; which I take to have been in the beginning of July, and after he had been absent upon this voyage a full twelve-month. Moreover, tho' he soon met here with several discouraging reports also, concerning the Spanish ambassador's stay at London only for his coming up, to prosecute him, as my said manuscript author has it; Raleigh still continued firm in that resolution. The said ambassador is, in some common memoirs, said to have been sent for over to Spain at this time; and in some again, that his commission was expir'd; but others think, that impatience to deliver the success of his negotiations spur'd him away, according to instruction, when he had got full assurance that Raleigh should be dispatch'd at some rate or other; whatever he could say for himself: for he departed for Spain three weeks before Raleigh came to London, having left the remainder of his business in the hands of some espanioliz'd partisans at court, whom he had made sure.

However,

* Here, since we are to take our leave of this Don Diego Sarmiento, the following remarks upon him may not be thought very digressory, since they mostly tend to the further illustration of Sir Walter Raleigh's story. His first coming into England, tho' omitted by our imperfect historians of king James's reign, is remember'd, by Sir John Finet, in his Observations touching Foreign Ambassadors, to have been in 1613; being aged then, as I compute, from a date upon one of his pictures, 45 years. Therein he further appears with short, thin, black hair, of a tall, meagre stature, with a longish visage, and a close, austere aspect; which made his open and jocose humour so much more taking, that 'tis said, he could perfectly rawish the heart of our Caledonian Solomon, with the little jests, tales and fables he would so readily apply upon all occasions. In the author aforesaid, may be read this ambassador's wearisome scruples against the state's ambassador, Sir Noell Carone, about right-hand and left, upper-hand and lower, chairs and stools, with such like weighty and indispensable points of honour among these sovereign ministers. As to his carriage against Sir Walter Raleigh, it appears sufficiently above, in the body of this narrative. But if he was related to that Don Pedro Sarmiento, a famous sea commander, before mention'd to have been Raleigh's prisoner, that accident might somewhat sharpen the said ambassador against him; but much more this new one of Diego de Palameca's being slain at St. Thome, who was his near relation, as captain King tells us. However his persecution of Raleigh appears with so much fury and intemperance throughout, as little agrees with that dexterity of management or circumvention which Osborne calls the business of an ambassador; and for which, among other things, he thought this such an incomparable agent. But indeed, it may not argue great strength of abilities to carry a great sway in the orb of government, no more than great strength of sinews to remove huge bodies in that of matter, so much as the great weakness or sequacity of those elements wherein they are centred or supported; and, as an ingenious writer observes, the power of the almighty is often evidenc'd by the weakness of the very instrument. There needed not the monsters of Africa to correct the sins of the Egyptians, a swarm of locusts could do it, and vermin formed out of the very dust; and tho' a whole country were destroy'd by such, will you argue, says he, they must needs have had the craft of foxes or the courage of lions? Some have intimated, that the Spanish ambassador could not, with all his worrying and baiting of king James, prevail so effectually for the destruction of Sir Walter Raleigh (how easy and tempting soever it might be to trample over the fence that is already broken down) but that he was forced to belabour the point with Spanish gold, among those creatures who had the greatest influence at court. For, as one writes, "The bargain was made, and Raleigh was devoted for a sacrifice before they knew whether he was successful or not; and, if we may believe the accounts that are left upon record of that part of history, the king of Spain gave a good sum of money for his head. Some have gone so far, as to tell us who had the money, at least a good part of it. If this be true, the English court had in it, at that time, some of the most infamous people that were ever concern'd in any administration. As to those who reprove the king himself with it, I shall say no more than this, they ought to have been very sure of the truth of it, before they recorded a thing of a British king so much beneath the character of any monarch in the world, viz. to take money from an enemy for the blood of their own subjects, and of such subjects too as were most dangerous to the very enemy they were sold to; which is neither less nor more, than selling their own safety, as well as innocent blood." See An Historical Account of the Voyages and Adventures of Sir Walter Raleigh, 8vo. 1719, p. 38. However it was, the Spanish ambassador seems to have left the English court well satisfied on the 16th, and embark'd for Spain on the 20th of July 1618, having first emptied all the prisons in England of Romish priests, many of whom he carried with him home, further to grace his triumphs. Yet all true Englishmen conceived hopes that the late action under Raleigh at Guiana, and a tumult lately happening at the Spanish ambassador's house in Barbican, upon the murder of a boy, would frustrate the match. But this ambassador return'd to England in the beginning of March 1619, under pretence of pursuing that delusive negotiation, and was lodg'd, not without murmurs, at the bishop of Ely's house in Holborne. He was also trick'd out with titular honours, the usual reward of such services as his were; being newly made Conde de Gondomar, as Sir John Finet observes; otherwise, in the whole, not so substantially rewarded at home, as the slavish pains he took abroad to please his prince was thought to deserve. The train of his other titles may be read in a pamphlet, not long after his return, dedicated to him here, call'd The Spanish English Roses or English Spanish Pomegranate; by a most fulsome flatterer, named Michael Du Val, who has further bolster'd him out, as well as Sir John Digby, newly created baron of Sherborne, (another precious promoter of the match) with such extravagant additions of false honours, as both disparage and discredit those which were real. As for the pernicious practices of this Spanish ambassador in England, which might gain him those airy gratuities, they are unfolded in another tract, entitled Vox Populi or News from Spain; translated according to the Spanish copy; which may serve to forewarn both England and the United Provinces how far to trust to Spanish Pretences. Printed 4to. 1620, reprinted, thirty-nine years after, with the title of, A choice Narrative of Count Gondomar's Transactions during his Embassy in England; (in this edition, said to be) written by Sir Robert Cotton. The editor, John Rowland, had no other reason for ascribing it to this renowned antiquary than his having treasur'd it up in manuscript, and that he died heart-broken: whereas he was not so much as heart-grieved when the first edition was publish'd; tho' in the Second Part, hereafter mention'd, he is said to have made heavy complaint against Gondomar. Nevertheless, the said editor, Rowland, may have observed justly enough in his dedication of it to Sir W. Pastons, "That Gondomar, with his facetious words and gestures, could pipe king James asleep; that he did sometimes hold the helm himself, and was near running the ship aground, or to have split her upon the rocks: That the influence of his ill aspect, and eclipsing the sun beams, is hardly over unto this present age: That his successor, Don Carlo Colonna, was thought, by many judicious men, to be more prudent; and that Gondomar was but a buffoon compared to him." In the treatise itself, Gondomar is represented in a Spanish council lately held at Avagen, and delivering his chief services to have been, 1st, His working a dislike between king James and his House of Commons, persuading him to rule by his prerogative; and as for money, to furnish himself by the marriage with Spain and by domestick projects, without any subsidy: also that he hereby kept England from furnishing its navy. 2<sup>dly</sup>, His shewing only a colourable resistance of our East-India trade, as being rather hurtful than helpful to the state, by carrying out our solid treasures, and bringing home spice, silk, feathers and toys; besides wasting our mariners. 3<sup>dly</sup>, His opposing our West-Indian voyages most strenuously, as what would raise another England to withstand their New Spain in America; therefore that he cross'd all the undertakings for Virginia and the Bermudas, causing the recusants, who were sharers, to withdraw their ventures and discourage the work. 4<sup>thly</sup>, That by this means likewise, he kept the voluntary forces from Venice, till it was almost too late to succour them. 5<sup>thly</sup>, That he stickled hard for the Cautionary Town, which the late king Philip called the keys of the Low-Countries. And 6<sup>thly</sup>, That the last, and not the least service he did was, in overthrowing Sir Walter Raleigh's voyage, and pursuing him, "I need not say almost to death," says he, if all things hit right and all strings hold." Further, that his commission would not let him tarry to be a spectator of his execution, "which I desired the rather (says

However, before he left England, an excellent letter seems to have been written by Raleigh in his own defence, and conveyed to the king; which, as we have it in print, runs thus: "May it please your most excellent majesty, If in my journey outward bound I had my men murder'd at the Islands, and yet spared to take revenge; if I did discharge some Spanish barks taken, without spoil; if I did forbear all parts of the Spanish Indies, wherein I might have taken twenty of their towns on the sea-coasts, and did only follow the enterprize I undertook for Guiana, where, without any directions from me, a Spanish village was burnt, which was new set up within three miles of the mine; by your majesty's favour, I find no reason why the Spanish ambassador should complain of me.

"If it were lawful for the Spaniards to murder twenty-six Englishmen, tying them back to back, and then cutting their throats, when they had traded with them a whole month, and came to them on the land without so much as one sword; and it may not be lawful for

"(says he) that by concession, I might have wrung from the inconsiderate English an acknowledgement of my master's right in those places, punishing him for attempting there, tho' they might prescribe for the first foot. And this I did to stop their mouths hereafter, and because I would quench the heat and valour of that nation, that none should dare hereafter to undertake the like, or be so hardy as to look out at sea, or breathe upon our coast: and lastly, because I would bring to ignominious death that old pirate, who is one of the last, now living, bred under that English Virago, and by her flesh'd in our blood and ruin. To do this I had many agents; first, divers courtiers, who were hungry and gaped wide for Spanish gold: secondly, some who bore him at heart for inveterate quarrels: thirdly, some foreigners, who having in vain sought the elixir heretofore, hope to find it in his head: fourthly, all men of the Romish faith, who are of the Spanish faction, and would have been my blood-hounds to hunt him or any such to death willingly. And lastly, I left behind me such an instrument, compos'd artificially, of a secular understanding and a religious profession, as he is every way adapted to screw himself into the closet of the heart, and to work upon feminine levity, who in that country have masculine spirits, to command and pursue their plots unto death."

How much soever this may be called a fictitious speech, it is founded on such matters of fact, that Rushworth, and others of our most serious historians, have admitted the substance thereof as perfect history. The same year this pamphlet was first printed, there was written another, call'd Vox Spiritus, or Sir Walter Raleigh's Ghost: being a Conference between Sir Gondomar, his majesty's ambassador of Spain; the Frier Confessor, and Father Baldwin the Jesuite, at Ely-House in Holborne, Nov. 20, 1620. For so I noted the true title to be, in a good old MS. copy of this conference, communicated to me, some time past, by Dr. Thomas Short, an eminent physician, at Sheffield in Yorkshire. It has lately been printed in Phœnix Britannicus, from another good copy in the library of a very worthy gentleman, under the title of Protopopæia: or Sir Walter Raleigh's Ghost, &c. but dated as tho' written two years later, which is a mistake, as any one would soon find who is acquainted with the history of those times. The purpose of this tract is, further to disclose Gondomar's mischievous transactions in England; as how he lull'd and deceived king James, perverted some noblemen to the Papish religion, and corrupted the prelacy to a toleration of Catholics; how the navy was neglected; what money was expended upon one survey, to know in whose possession were the abbey-lands; how much a search cost of our harbours and havens; and how much to enumerate the well-affected to their religion: till the ghost of Raleigh rising, detects their devices under these five heads. 1. The propagation of the Catholic religion. 2. The exaltation of the pope's supremacy. 3. The glorification of the Spanish monarchy. 4. The extenuation of the Low-Country's glory. 5. The abuse of England's simplicity; and the whole, finally, to decry the match with the Infanta. In 1622, about Easter, Gondomar committed a gross solecism in politicks, by suffering his ungovernable passion so to expose his leiger honour, by striking William Lithgow, the Scotch traveller, whom he had long deceived with promises of reparation for the imprisonment, tortures, and robberies committed on him by the Inquisition at Malaga, as may be read in the book of his Travels; that the said ambassador got his ears soundly box'd by him before a numerous crowd of noble witnesses. "His fistula, says Lithgow (meaning, I think, his cane, tho' alluding to his disease) was contrabanded by a fist; and for victory, favour lent me authority." He was imprison'd for it nine weeks in the Marshalsea; "whence I returned (says he) with more credit, than he left England with honesty." In June following, as Camden tells us, Gondomar was reported to be imprison'd in Spain, for so much promoting the match; and that the Infanta was to be marry'd to the grand duke of Tuscany. Two years after, came out The second Part of Vox Populi, or Gondomar's appearing in the Likeness of a Machiavel in a Spanish Parliament: wherein are discover'd his treacherous and subtle Practices to the Ruin as well of England as the Netherlands. Translated out of the Spanish copy: Printed at Gorcum, 4to. 1624. Dedicated to Frederick and Elizabeth, king and queen of Bohemia, and Maurice, prince of Orange, count of Nassau; by T. S. of V. alias Thomas Scot, as the late Thomas Rawlinson, Esq; was rightly of opinion; with pictures of Gondomar, his litter, and bottomless chair, &c. "Herein (says the author to one of those princes) you shall perceive the curtain drawn from before the Spaniard, that the world may, for certain, see he is not so beautiful as many of our English, who so long have doated on him, would make him to be; nor on the other side, so terrible that your Dutch need fear him, how grim soever he looks upon them." It would be too tedious to recite the particulars of his deluding and defrauding the English nation recorded in this pamphlet; how he wrested presents and pensions from the Catholics, no less than ten thousand pounds from Sir Robert Cotton's friends and acquaintance; and from several ladies great sums of money, to be repaid when Dona Maria arrived in England, or to prefer them at court under her; selling the place of groomes of the stole to six several ladies; and many other such like profound acts of policy. But above all, that his compassing the secret of Sir Walter Raleigh's voyage and transmitting it to Spain, and procuring his death, drew the special notice and thanks of his royal sovereign, as the crown and matter-piece of his negotiations. Much paper might be also employ'd in repeating the jests, stories, and sayings of this Gondomar while among us, which have been treasur'd up by some rare politicians of those times; in most of which he was more witty than wise, exposing in some his narrow spirit in matters of gratitude; and in others, frequently ridiculing the very religion he profess'd. Two years afterwards, the court was haunted with another pamphlet, call'd Sir Walter Raleigh's Ghost; or England's Forewarner. Discovering a secret Consultation newly holden in the Court of Spain. Together with his tormenting of Count de Gondomar; and his strange Affrightment, Confession, and publick Recantation: laying open many Treacheries for the Subversion of England, &c. 4to. Ulrich, 1626: which I shall here say no more of having before quoted it in these sheets; nor of another book besides, call'd Sir Walter Raleigh's Ghost; printed in 8vo. several years after; because written on a subject which concerns not this ambassador. We may refer Gondomar's disgrace in the Spanish court, with the sending over of his son by the king of Spain, a beggar of reward in king Charles's court, for the services of his father, to the honour of Spanish history; and conclude the little, of much that might be here said more of him, in the words of an observant contemporary; who relating how the hypocritical archbishop of Spalato was made away with by poison, &c. adds, "That the statesman Gondomar, was requited in like sort, notwithstanding all his services for the church of Rome, his sollicitations against Sir Walter Raleigh, his catechizing of Spalato, &c. For, by way of gratitude, he had, as is reported, given him a Spanish fig, or else, tho' ever a merry man, died at last for very grief." See James Wadsworth's further Observations of the English Spanish Pilgrim, concerning Spain, 4to. 1630, p. 28.

WHEN Raleigh had settled his affairs in the west of England he began his journey for Lon- don, pursuant to his first resolution : but before he came to Ashburton, twenty miles from Plymouth, he was met by Sir Lewis Stucley ; who said, “ he had orders for arresting him and “ his ship.” Raleigh answer’d, “ he had saved him the labour, and done it to his hands.”
 And tho’ at that time Stucley had no warrant, as our MS. author aforesaid goes on, for such arrest, either from the king, or the lords of the council, “ for it seems that his haste was so great,
 “ and his heart so set upon some supposed purchase, that he could not stay for a warrant ;”
 yet Raleigh, being told by him, that he had such a verbal commission from the secretary, did in no wise resist even that authority. So they went back together to Plymouth, and lay at Sir Christopher Harris his house ; where Sir Walter Raleigh was so little watch’d, that he was sometimes two or three days without seeing Sir Lewis Stucley. And Raleigh himself says, that Stucley left him nine or ten days to go where he listed, while he rode about the country. <sup>c</sup> However, as we learn from captain King, it did, at last, come into Raleigh’s mind (whether upon some private advices, how insuperably the prejudice of his enemies was working against him ; or any suggestions of his own, how he might work a reconciliation more successfully from abroad, it is not said, but contrive he did) to convey himself out of the kingdom. Therefore, while they were at Plymouth, he employ’d our author, the said captain King to provide him a bark that would carry him over into France. King James’s Declaration says, Raleigh dealt for a bark, as for a friend, and proffered twelve crowns for the passage : <sup>d</sup> Stucley says, he dealt with two captains of French barks : <sup>e</sup> the Declaration says, Raleigh was then under no guard, and Stucley, that he was then under his keeping. But leaving these inconformities to others, I here follow captain King, who informs us, that himself procur’d the vessel, which is most likely, and that he detain’d it nigh four days, riding at anchor beyond command of the fort. The first night, about one of the clock, they secretly took boat to have gone aboard, but before they reach’d the bark, Raleigh, whether through some more prevailing thought that might arise of a generous reliance upon the king, or a more confident dependance upon the justice of his cause, or for any thing he left behind, or would have first left either in writing or otherwise, does not yet appear ; but certain it is he changed his resolution, and returned to his lodging unsuspected by any one. The next day, he sent money to the master of the bark, to retain him one night more ; and yet Raleigh never went nigh him afterwards.

It has been objected, as captain King goes on, (who does not say by whom, but I find it in the king’s Declaration <sup>f</sup>) that Raleigh was obliged to return, because the night was so dark that he could not find the vessel: "but I (says the captain) who was with him, will take my oath, that if he had been only willing to have rowed a quarter of a mile further, he might have seen her. Besides, if that night would not have served, one of the other three would, the wind being fair, and the tide falling out conveniently.

AFTER this, says captain King, Stucley received a warrant to bring up Sir Walter Raleigh, but with no more speed than his health would permit; and he took to his assistance, one Manourie, a French quack, "upon what occasion (says King) I here willingly omit, as well because I would not meddle with any instrument of state, as because I, little suspecting what followed, was somewhat careless in the observance of their carriage."

IN their journey they baited and lodg'd at divers gentlemen's houses of Raleigh's acquaintance upon the road, from some of whom hearing, more distinctly the nearer he approach'd it, what a storm his enemies had brew'd at court, he began to regret his having neglected the opportunity he had at Plymouth of retiring; which he discoursed of to his lady and to me, says captain King, who told him, "He could blame none but himself." But after that peremptory warrant which a pursuivant brought down for the speedy bringing up of his person, he began again to meditate upon a retreat; tho', as he grew more desirous, it grew more difficult. Therefore, when he had made such inland advancement on his journey as to have no means left that would favour him by water, "He once more employed me (says captain King) who was always ready to do any thing that might procure his safety; being well assur'd in my own conscience, tho' he sought to absent himself till the Spanish fury was over; yet, as he always said, That no misery should make him disloyal to his king or country. And altho' Manourie, in his Declaration, sets down that Sir Walter Raleigh should, to him in private, speak ill of his majesty; yet I must protest till my last hour, that in all the years I followed him, I never heard him name his majesty but with reverence: I am sorry the assertion of that man should prevail so much against the dead."

The particulars of captain King's employment for this second escape, we shall respite a while, to make way for those, which, according to the due course of time, must now be recur'd to out of that Frenchman's Declaration, as captain King calls it above, and shall do it with such justice as not to omit or disguise any of the ill words, against his majesty, ascribed to Raleigh therein. But can only do it from that which was suffer'd to appear after Raleigh's death, annexed to king James's Declaration; and thereby chuse rather to hazard a trespass upon the patience of some readers, who may think it a detail of improbable, at least insignificant objections, than incur the censure of partiality from others in omitting it; since king James, and consequently his council, thought it would pass for matter of such importance, by their making it so great a part of what was hoped would justify his proceedings against Raleigh; and of such authority, as to need no other evidence: not that it is there too expressively or positively call'd Manourie's Declaration, or his confession or examination upon oath, but by a pretty, light, pliable phrase, 'tis said, "The story himself reporteth to have pass'd in this manner."

UPON Saturday, the 25th of July, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Lewis Stucley, and the said Manourie went to lie at Mr. Drake's, where the letters of commission from the privy council were brought to Sir Lewis Stucley, and that Raleigh hereat changing countenance, exclaimed with an oath, Is it possible my fortune should return upon me thus again? This hastening their departure, they advanc'd on Sunday morning nearer to London about four miles, and baited at Mr. Horsey's. That here Raleigh first caus'd Manourie to be sounded what was in his heart (suspecting, apparently, that he was designed as a spy over him) by his old domestick, captain King; who, discoursing Manourie upon Raleigh's calamities, said, I wish we were all at Paris. Manourie answer'd, I would we were all at London; what should we do at Paris? Because, said King, as soon as we come to London, they will commit Sir Walter to the Tower, and cut off his head. Manourie said, he hoped better things, and that, according to his ability, he was ready to do him all honest service. After dinner they set forward for Sherborne; and here Raleigh is said to tell Manourie, All that was his, and the king had unjustly taken it from him. Manourie, and Raleigh's retinue lay in the town that night; but Raleigh himself and Stucley, at old Mr. Parbam's. On Monday they got to Salisbury, where, as Raleigh was walking on foot down the hill, and had found, by enquiry, that Manourie had got some physick about him, he desired him to prepare a vomit against morning. "For I know," said he, (as he is here represented, with a surprising faith already in such a man) "'twill be good to evacuate bad humours; and by this means, I shall gain time to work my friends, order my affairs, and perhaps pacify his majesty: otherwise, as soon as I come to London, they'll have me to the Tower, and cut off my head, which I cannot escape without coun-

"interfering sickness, which your vomits will effect without suspicion." Accordingly that, at Salisbury, he complained of a dimness of sight, with a dizziness in his head; and, when he was conducted towards his chamber, that he stagger'd, and struck himself with such violence against a pillar in the gallery, as made Stucley think he was sick indeed; and in that belief, Manourie left him for that time. On Tuesday morning, Raleigh sent his lady with the greatest number of his servants forwards to London; and now it was he also sent captain King thither, on the expedition aforesaid (whom we shall meet with there, prepared for the same, as soon as Manourie is brought to an end of this same story.) Then comes a servant of Raleigh's, into Stucley's chamber, and declares his master was out of his wits, that he left him in his shirt, upon all four, scratching and gnawing the rushes on the planks. Stucley sent Manourie, who found him in bed; and asking "what he ail'd?" he answer'd, "Nothing; but that he did it on purpose." That then Raleigh asked for the vomit, and took it without any hesitation. At Stucley's entrance, that he fell a raving; and, before his vomit operated, had such strong convulsions upon him, that Stucley, and all the help he could get, were not strong enough to prevent the contraction of his sinews as fast as the company could draw them straight, insomuch that Stucley caused him to be chaf'd and fomented, but that Raleigh, truly, afterwards laugh'd at it to Manourie, and said (such a confident is he now grown!) he had made Stucley a perfect physician.

In the next place, Raleigh must be observed to take some repose; so Manourie is shut into the room with him, and having dissuaded him from a more violent vomit, because his first did not yet work, Raleigh ask'd, if he knew not of some preparation which would make him look ghastly and irksome outwardly, and not affect the vitals, or make him inwardly sick. After a pause, Manourie assur'd him he could furnish him with a harmless ointment, which would yet soon make him all over like a leper. "Whereby, we are told, Raleigh said, "the lords would be afraid to approach him, and that it would move their pity besides." Soon after he had been thus anointed on the brows, arms and breast, the blisters rose so successfully, and so soon ripen'd to their full discolourations, that Stucley, at his next visit, perceiving Raleigh's body all broke out in purple spots with yellow heads, and the rest of his skin so inflamed with heat, concluded he was struck over with the plague, and that it was highly contagious. But asking Manourie's opinion, he truly concealed all, for that, as yet, he knew nothing of Raleigh's intended flight; but thought it was only to gain time to satisfy his majesty. However, away went Stucley to the grave bishop Andrewes, then upon the point of his translation to Winchester, and soon made known what a frightful figure Sir Walter Raleigh was become; described all the tokens upon him, and, in the end, return'd with two doctors, and one batchelor of physick. All their skill could not enlighten them with one spark of knowledge in the nature of his distemper; but they gave their opinion in writing, that the patient could not be removed into the air without manifest hazard of his life; and Manourie set his hand to it.

HERE, Raleigh is describ'd to have been much delighted that matters went on so prosperously, especially that the vomit worked so thoroughly in the presence of these learned doctors. But having apprehended they would inspect his water, he directed Manourie to rub the urinal with a certain drug, which turned all to such a dismal colour, and such a disagreeable scent, that if heaven did not prescribe, the patient must perish; for nothing could the physicians do but pronounce the disease mortal. Further, that he then made Manourie bind his arm about with the black silk ribband which he took from his poniard; but that not distempering his pulse agreeable to expectation, he had more blisters raised the next day. By this time his physick having opened his stomach and made him hungry, he got Manourie secretly to buy a leg of mutton and three loaves, which he fed upon in private, and by this subtilty, was thought to have fasted three days, that is to Friday the last of July, ever feigning great indisposition and uneasiness in company; but when alone, for to get the opportunity of being so was the chief source of all the artifice he did here really put in practice, he wrote his declaration or Apology, and is said to have got Manourie to make him a transcript of it; which was, as the penman of this story further says, since presented to his majesty. But by an expression of that ambiguity and latitude, whether we are designed to understand it was before or after Raleigh's death; that penman, intelligent enough in other parts of Manourie's said story, and the rest of the king's Declaration (for they were both of them visibly cast in one mould) might think it not necessary to be so here. It was surely a most vexatious stratagem, that Raleigh should unexpectedly make such a provoking vindication of his voyage, and thereby defeat the preparations that were were making to cut him off for it: but however it may, in the opinion of posterity, have cleared his innocence; among his contemporaries, it could not secure his safety.

THE same night, as the story goes on, apparently to raise inflammations beyond his own person, he insinuated to Stucley, that he thought he had taken poison at Mr. Parham's, for that he was a Papist, and kept a priest in his house; but desired, and particularly to Monsieur, that it might not be spoken of. A while after, being in his bed-chamber undress'd, and no body present but his friend Manourie, he is said to have taken a looking-glass in his hand to admire his spotted face, and to have merrily observed to his said confidant, how they should one day laugh for having thus cozen'd the king, council, physicians, and Spaniards and all.

ON the first of August, being the day that the king arrived in his progress at Salisbury, Raleigh is said to have taken Manourie in private, and having open'd a red leather trunk, put into his hand nine pieces of Spanish gold, saying, "There is twenty crowns in pistolets, which I give you for your physical receipts, and the victuals you bought me: and I will give you fifty pounds a year if you will do what I tell you: and if Sir Lewis Stucley asks what conference you have had with me, tell him that you comfort me in my adversity, and that I make you no other answer than what is here written," giving him a piece of paper containing these words, "Ve la, M. Manourie, l'acceptance de tous mes travaux; perte de mon estate, et de mon fils; mes maladies et douleurs: Ve la, c'effet de ma confiance au roy."<sup>b</sup> Which paper of Raleigh's own hand-writing, was afterwards produced by Manourie.

AND now Raleigh is pretended to practise more unreservedly still about the escape with Manourie, as being all in his power to aid him, and he the only person trusted by Stucley. Whereupon he proposes, that Raleigh, at his coming to London, should lie perdue at a friend of Manourie's in Shire-Lane, which did not long engage his approbation, for Raleigh resolved otherwise; telling this only person trusted by Stucley (through an incredible profuseness of communication) "that he had sent captain King to hire him a bark below Gravesend, which would go with all winds, and another little boat to carry him to it." Adding, that "to hide himself in London, he should be always apprehensive of a discovery by the general searchers that are there; but that to escape, he must get leave to go to his own house, and being there, he would so handle the matter as to slip from Stucley through a back-door into the boat with ease; for no body would dream he could go on foot, seeing him so feeble as he seemed to be." Then that Manourie should say, "Why would you fly? your Apology and your last declaration, do they not sufficiently justify you?" and that Raleigh should silence him with, "Tell me no more; a man that fears, is never secure."

IN the next place, Raleigh is said to have procur'd the king's licence to be at his own house when he should come to London: and that when Manourie hereupon observed, his majesty seemed not inclin'd to take away his life, since he suffer'd him to repair to his own habitation for the recovery of his health; that Raleigh should reply, "They used all these kinds of flatteries to the duke of Biron, to draw him fairly into prison, and then they cut off his head." Adding, "I know they have concluded among them, it is expedient that a man should die to re-assure the traffick which I have broken with Spain." Thereupon, says our story, he broke forth into the most hateful and traitorous words against the king's own person (but it surprisingly <sup>a</sup> Sir Walter Raleigh's Apology for his Voyage to Guiana, was not publish'd, that I can find, before 1650, and then commonly annexed to his Select Essays, printed in 8vo. the same year, where it contains 58 pages. But in Henry Hexam's Tongue-Combat between two Soldiers in the Gravesend Tilt-boar, 4to. 1623, p. 75, &c. it is quoted as a piece then well known, in manuscript at least, if not in print. And T. Chalonier must have had a knowledge of this Apology, or of Raleigh's Journal, when among the verses prefix'd to T. Gage's Survey of the West-Indies, Fol. 1648, he said,

Renowned Raleigh twice did undertake
With labour great, and dangers not a few,
A true discovery of these parts to make,
And thereof wrote both what he saw and knew.

This Apology was afterwards reprinted with the Essays abovemention'd in 1667. And again with the Abridgement of Raleigh's History of the World, 8vo. 1700. But neither of the printed editions is so correct, in names, places, numbers, &c. as some manuscripts, in being, might probably have render'd them; particularly one copy presented to the library of St. John's college, Cambridge, by the learned and reverend Mr. Thomas Baker; containing 22 pages in a small hand, folio. This is dated two days after Raleigh's death, and sent by way of letter, from one who had long somewhat inwardly known him, to a friend; which particular we have not in the printed copies; but it begins as those in print do, with these words, If ill success of this enterprize of mine had been without example, &c. There is also a good old copy or two of this Apology among Sir Hans Sloane's MS. collections, mark'd, in his library, A. 271, and B. 521. Other manuscripts there are also of it in other libraries of the learned. As to the character of it, no more need be said than in captain King's words, where he "refers those who would be satisfied about this voyage, to an Apology written by Raleigh himself, in which he hath faithfully and truly set down (says he) all the passages thereof."

<sup>b</sup> As much as to say, "Behold there, M. Manourie, the fruit of all my toils; the loss of my fortune and of my son, the sickness I have endured and the sorrows: behold there, the effect of that faith I reposed in his majesty." But behold where? —for that ve la or voila, repeated as it is, plainly points at some more copious or convincing evidence which accompanied this expression, and more particularly demonstrated those losses and afflictions to have been the fruit of Raleigh's trust or faith in the king; to which these words appear but a bare direction; and which therefore seems here to have been suppress'd.

omits them all to object only his) ending with this improbable rant, "that if he could but save himself for this time, he would plot such Plots as should make the king think himself happy to send for him again, and restore him to his estate with advantage; yea, and would force the king of Spain to write into England in his favour."

NAY, when Manourie (as we are further persuaded) shewed such care and concern for Stucley as to ask, what would become of him if Raleigh escap'd? Whether he would be put to death, or lose his office and estate? Raleigh is said to answer, "Not to death; but he would be imprison'd for a while, yet his lands were assured to his eldest son, and for the rest it was no part of his care." Then Manourie asks, if it were not treason in himself to be aiding to his escape? "No; answers Raleigh, you are a foreigner. However, if you pretend to know any thing, they'll put you in prison." "But what if I am discover'd to have a hand in your escape?" says t'other. "Why follow me into France, your own country, replies Raleigh; quit all and I will make amends for all."

As they travell'd, between Andover and Stains, Manourie, as this story that is ascrib'd to him acknowledges, discovered Raleigh's intended escape to Stucley, who thenceforth used extraordinary diligence in guards and watches upon him, which Raleigh perceiving, as it is also own'd, nevertheless trusts Manourie with a new proposal at Stains in these words; "I see it is not possible to escape by our two means alone, Stucley is so watchful, and sets such strict guard upon me, and will be too hard for us with all our cunning; therefore there is no way but to make him of our council; and if we can persuade him to let me save myself, I will give him in hand the worth of two hundred pounds sterling." Upon these words, he drew forth and shewed Manourie a jewel made in the fashion of hail, powder'd with diamonds, having a ruby in the middle, valued at a hundred and fifty pounds sterling; and putting it into his hands said, "Besides this jewel, he shall have fifty pounds in money: pray tell him as much from me, and persuade him to it, I know he will trust you."

THIS overture being made by Manourie, Stucley, after some parley, sent back word by him to Raleigh, "that he would accept of his offer, and bad him tell Raleigh he was content to do as he had desired: but would chuse rather to go with him than tarry behind with shame and reproach;" directing Manourie further to ask, "how this could be done without losing his office of vice-admiral, which cost him six hundred pounds; also to what place they should go, how they should live afterwards, and what means he would carry with him to furnish this intended escape?" Raleigh obviates all this with praying him to tell Stucley, "that if he would swear unto him not to discover him, he would tell him his whole intent; and that for the first point, tho' Stucley were to lose his office, he should yet be no loser; that as soon as he was got into France or Holland, his wife was to send him a thousand pounds; and that he should carry with him only a thousand crowns in money and jewels to serve at present." After supper, Raleigh is further represented so open, so contrary to all his former character, and beyond all manner of belief, as to say, "O if I could escape without Stucley, I should do bravely; but its no matter, I'll carry him along, and afterwards dispatch myself of him well enough." Then Manourie having apprised Stucley of all that pass'd, brought them together. Raleigh shewed the jewel, and, probably, deliver'd it, for Stucley shewed himself content, and it was probably upon the acceptance of it, but desired a little respite to dispose of his office. Manourie, having thus seen the agreement made, took his leave of them for London (the part design'd for him ending here) after having said to Raleigh, "he did not think of seeing him again, while he was in England." Raleigh, at parting, gave him, by a letter to a person at Radford, an iron furnace, with a distillatory of copper belonging to it; and charged him "to tell every body he met, how sick he was, and that he left him in an extreme looseness that very night."

BUT as Raleigh had dispatch'd captain King to London with instructions to be in readiness for him, he kept moving on; when there fell out an accident which gave him fresh hopes to facilitate his escape. For when he came to his inn at Brentford, he was met by a Frenchman, named La Chesnay, a follower of Le Clerc, agent from the French king; who told Raleigh, the said French agent was very desirous to speak with him, as soon as he got to London, about some affairs which highly concerned his safety. Accordingly the next night after Raleigh was at London, the said Le Clerc and La Chesnay came to visit him at his house: and there Le Clerc offer'd him a French bark, which he had prepared for him to escape in; and withal, his letters recommendatory for his safe conduct and reception, to the governor of Calais; and to send a gentleman expressly that should attend and meet him there. But Raleigh understanding the French bark not to be so ready nor so fit as that he had already proposed for himself, himself, gave him thanks, and told him, that he would make use of his own bark, but for his letters, and the rest of his offer, that he should be beholden to him, because his acquaintance in France was worn out. <sup>a</sup> With this passage, and a word or two only of Raleigh's attempt to escape, after he came to London, it not being thought proper here to expatiate upon the arts used in betraying it, ends the tedious fardel of objections accumulated to render him unworthy of mercy in the king's Declaration, and the story ascribed to the obscure Frenchman afore-said in it, but unconfirmed by any affidavit or evidence upon oath, which, in other such cases, have been thought necessary vouchers: therefore how far to be call'd heinous offences, acts of hostility, depredations, abuses of his charge, impostures and declensions of justice, the reader may now first give his own judgment, and then compare it with what has been before said of these accusations by others. <sup>b</sup>

AND now comes on the remainder of captain King's Narrative; wherein he tells us, that from Salisbury he was sent before to London to provide a boat, and to lay her as low as Tilbury; and that he was also advis'd to put one Cotterell in trust, who had been Raleigh's servant, for the provision of a wherry. As soon as King came to London, he dealt with Cotterell, who seemed as willing to do Sir Walter Raleigh service as himself; but telling him of one Hart, who had been boatswain to the said captain's ship, and had a ketch of his own; with him the captain therefore agreed, and gave him money to get it in readiness, having vowed secrecy upon the reward which the captain further promised him. But he had no sooner received the thirty pieces of silver than he betray'd the design to Mr. William Herbert, who as suddenly made it known; but King not suspecting any discovery, still fed Hart with money to keep the ketch at Tilbury.

<sup>a</sup> Raleigh might say this to get his recommendation the stronger, but indeed his fame was now in high request at the French court. For one of the noblest scholars in France, Nicholas Claudius Fabricius, lord of Peirefsk, writing, soon after, a letter over to Camden, concludes it with these words, J'ay eu un grand desplaisir d'entendre le mauvais succès de la navigation de my lord Rallé; parce que c'est un personnage, dont la valeur et le mérite font en grande recommandation: s'il se fait aucune relation de son voyage, je seray bien aise de la voir. Camdeni Epistolæ, 2<sup>o</sup>. 1691, p. 243. The original of this letter, written by the said Peirefskus to Camden, is preserv'd in the Cotton library.

As for that negotiation of this French agent with Sir Walter Raleigh after he arrived at London, to remove him from those who thirsted after his blood, into the protection of a state which better knew how to value his great accomplishments, it was not so closely manag'd by them, but it took wind at court, insomuch that Monsieur de la Chesnaye was brought to an examination before the lords, and having confess'd his being employ'd by Le Clerc in the design of conveying Sir Walter Raleigh to France, he was, in September following, committed to a justice of peace's house in the nature of a close prisoner. Le Clerc was also cited to appear before the council. And here, through those eternal peccadillos which are ever brambling the course of embassies, arose a dispute, which however justifiably it might be maintain'd by the said French ambassador, seems yet to have added some fuel to the fire of indignation already kindled against Sir Walter Raleigh. For Le Clerc declar'd, he would continue dumb to all their interrogatories till he should be us'd with that distinction which others, qualified as he was, had before been. Instancing, that Sir W. Becher, then agent for King James in France, had, at an audience before the council of state, claimed the right, in honour of his representative quality, of not propounding his business till the lords of the council should stand up as he did, and be uncover'd as he was: for, being in that place ambassador, he should be allowed to sit and be cover'd, as the counsellors were at the time of their audience. This, Le Clerc affirmed, had been yielded to by the king his master's counsellors, and therefore he challeng'd the like respect from their lordships. The lords answer'd, that different countries had their different forms of treaty; and that the manner of proceeding in France, was no rule for ours in England. But Le Clerc persisted inflexibly in his right to this privilege. Then the lords, neither to comply with his demand, nor constrain his resolution, determin'd to lay aside all form or ceremony, by retiring, promiscuously, into another room, no ways affected with the observances of the council-chamber, and there to discourse over his transactions in favour of Sir Walter Raleigh, as a matter of private and indifferent conversation. Here Le Clerc made many solemn protestations that he knew nothing at all of the matter, till at length, after the confrontment of Le Chesnaye, and his re-confession of their employment for Sir Walter Raleigh's escape, Le Clerc could no longer face it out, but confess'd it likewise himself. King James being informed thereof, Le Clerc had notice given him by the lords, to forbear all further exercise of his charge, and not to appear at court, till it should be known, by the return of a messenger they had sent express to France, whether the king his master would herein avow his minister's actions. This was on, or not long after, the 17th of September; soon after Sir W. Becher was confin'd to his house in France; and about a month after, a dispatch came over to Le Clerc with particular charge to deliver it himself into King James's own hand, to try if he could by that means, recover himself again at court. Away posted Le Clerc to Royston, where the king then was, and offering, himself to present the letters, could gain no admission; but being refer'd to the lords in waiting, he said, he would either personally, according to his instructions, or not at all, perform that service. So he returned to London, and from thence, in a few days, or about a week before Sir Walter Raleigh's death, to France, with his letters undeliver'd; and the revocation of the English agent thereupon ensued. See Camden's Annals of King James; but chiefly Finetti Philoxenis: or choice Observations of Sir John Finet, Master of the Ceremonies to the two last Kings, touching the Reception, Precedence, Treatment, Audience, Puntilios and Conteſts of foreign Ambassadors in England, 8vo. 1656, p. 56. Also L' Ambassadeur, et ses Fonctions, par Monsieur de Wiquetfort, 4<sup>o</sup>. 1690, tom. 1. p. 397. where, tho' he says, La cour de France auroit bien voulu maintenir son ministre; yet that after Monsieur Le Clerc returned to France, il ne fut pas fort considéré depuis ce temps là. Such the fate of unsuccessful service!

<sup>b</sup> Upon the great murmurs and discontent among the people, which so generally arose at the putting of Sir Walter Raleigh to death, insomuch that, tho' one of Essex's adversaries, he was pitied even by Essex's friends; "King James, after the mode of weak and ill-constituted princes (says Osborne) set forth a Declaration; which, according to the ordinary success of such apologies, render'd the condition of that proceeding worse in the world's opinion." Another author observing, "Such is the power of envy, and so really criminal it is to be master of more merit than such a prince knew how to value, and to have done services which they could not sufficiently reward, that this alone was Raleigh's crime:" and having observed that his very enemies had acknowledged the reasonableness of his attempt at Guiana, with the just measures he took to put it in execution; and, besides his personal valour and publick conduct, the excellence of all the dispositions he made for his expedition, concludes (with regard to the king's Declaration) "That they had not any thing to lay to his charge on that part, but what was so evidently malicious, and so foolish in the contrivance also, as made all men ashamed that heard it." See the Historical Account of Sir Walter Raleigh's Voyages and Adventures, 8vo. 1719, p. 37, 38.

ON Friday night, which was the 7th of August, Sir Walter Raleigh came to London, when captain King attended on him at his lodgings, but was told by Raleigh that he could in no wise get ready to go off that night. It seems to be the next day that Stucley got his warrant to indemnify him for any contract he should enter into with Sir Walter Raleigh, or to authorize his compliance with any offer he should make him for his escape, or in short, as others have not spared to call it, a licence to betray him; for tho' Raleigh might now have been secured in a direct and undisguised manner, yet the glory was to do it insidiously, and under the vizard of friendship; being not more suitable to the genius of predominant power, than necessary on the present occasion, to give room for so many more little circumstances of objection as might occur to supply the place of one wanting, that should have been capital. And this night it was that the French ambassador aforesaid, came to Raleigh's house, and made the proposal before recited. But when captain King came to him again the same night, Raleigh said there was no going now without Stucley, whom he doubted not but he should engage to go along with him, and that the next night, without failure, he would meet the captain at the Tower Dock. As for Mr. Herbert, aforesaid, he was employ'd in garrowing Sir Walter Raleigh's house, as the captain phrases it, while Raleigh, being thus drawn out of it by Stucley, under pretence of bearing him company, might be the more unexpectedly seiz'd with all such private papers as he should have about him; in hopes, no doubt, that by one means or other, something might turn out to make a charge of sufficient weight against him. But, in the conclusion, says our said author, all the papers which were found, proved to be no other, than what might, without any discredit, have been laid open to all the world.

CAPTAIN King went, as he further tells us, on Sunday night to the place appointed with two wherries; and Sir Walter Raleigh also came thither; having put on a false beard, and a hat with a green hatband. He was accompanied with Sir Lewis Stucley, young Stucley, and his own page. Then asking captain King, if all things were ready? he answer'd, they were, and that the cloak-bag and the four pistols were in the boat. Stucley then saluted captain King, and ask'd, whether thus far he had not distinguished himself an honest man? to which King answer'd, that he hop'd he would continue so.

AFTER they enter'd the boats and divided the pistols, they had not rowed above twenty strokes before the watermen told them, that Mr. Herbert had lately taken boat, and made as if he would have gone through-bridge, but returned down the river after them. This raised some apprehension in Raleigh, but, upon Stucley's encouragement, they rowed on; yet Raleigh, not well satisfied, called captain King near to him, who was in the other boat with young Stucley and Hart, and intimated, that he could not go forward unless he was sure of the watermen, whom he then also spake to, asking, whether, if any should come to arrest them in the king's name, they would row forwards or return. At this, the great boobies were so frightned that they cry'd, and answer'd, they knew no body there but captain King, who had hired them to Gravesend; and that they neither dared, nor would go any further. Raleigh said, that a brabbling matter with the Spanish ambassador, was the cause that of necessity he must go to Tilbury to embark for the Low Countries; and that he would give them ten pieces of gold for their pains.

THEN began Stucley's part, cursing and damning himself that he should be so unfortunate as to venture his life and fortune with a man so full of doubts and fears. He swore that if the watermen would not row on, he would kill them; and persuaded Raleigh that there was no such danger as he suspected; of which opinion captain King also still was. Thus the time past till they drew near Greenwich, when a wherry cross'd them, which Raleigh said came to discover them. King sought to dissuade him from this supposition, and told him, that if they could but reach Gravesend, he would hazard his life to get to Tilbury. These delays spent the tide, and the watermen said, it was impossible to get to Gravesend before morning. Hereupon Raleigh would have landed at Purfleet, and Hart would have possess'd him, that tho' it was night he could procure him horses to Tilbury. Stucley appeared very zealous for this proposal, and said, that upon that condition he could be content to carry the cloak-bag on his own shoulders half a mile; but King told him, that if they could not go by water, it was impossible, at that time of night, to get horses to go by land.

By this time they had rowed as far as Woolwich, or rather about a mile beyond, which might be to a reach call'd the Gallions near Plumstead. Here, approaching two or three ketches, Hart began to doubt whether any one of them was his. Upon this, Raleigh concluded they were all betray'd, and bid the watermen turn back, hoping to have got to his own house before morning; and began to examine Hart very strictly; who pretended he had given his men express charge not to stir from Tilbury till he came down; but this would not induce Raleigh to proceed. Before they had rowed back a furlong, they espied another wherry, and hailing her, they said they were for the king. Raleigh perceiving they were some of Mr. Herbert's crew, proposed to Stucley, seeing they were discover'd, and in respect to his safety, that he might remain still in his custody; and that Stucley should openly declare to the watermen, he was his prisoner, which he did. Here Stucley and he fell into private discourse, contriving how Raleigh might reach his house; and how Stucley might save himself harmless by saying, that he only pretended to go along with Raleigh in order to discover his intentions, and seize upon his private papers. Then they whisper'd some time together, and Raleigh taking some things out of his pockets (whether more rubies powder'd with diamonds, our author does not say) and gave them to Stucley, who all this while, not only hugg'd and embrac'd him, as it seem'd with the greatest tenderness, but made the utmost protestations of love, friendship, and fidelity. When they were got back to Greenwich, Stucley said, that he durst not carry Raleigh to his house, but persuaded him to land, which they did; the other strange boat landing at the same time, in which the men, they perceived, belonged to Mr. W. Herbert and Sir William St. John, the same who had made good profit of Raleigh before, as we have read. Upon Greenwich bridge, Stucley told captain King, it would be for Sir Walter's good, that he should pretend he was consenting with him to betray his master. King, not able to fathom the depth of this policy, as he tells us, refus'd it, thinking he should not only thereby belie his own conscience, but make himself odious to the world; therefore, tho' Raleigh himself made some motion of it to him, he could not, how serviceable soever it might prove, be guilty of so much insincerity towards him. Then Stucley arrested the captain in his majesty's name, and committed him to the charge of two of Mr. Herbert's men. After this they all went to a tavern, and by the way, captain King heard Raleigh say, Sir Lewis, these actions will not turn out to your credit. Raleigh was kept apart from King till morning, when as they enter'd into the Tower, Raleigh said to him, Stucley and Cotterell have betray'd me; adding, for your part, you need be in fear of no danger, but as for me, it is I am the mark that is shot at. Then captain King, being forced to take his leave, left Raleigh, to his tuition, with whom I do not doubt (says he) but his soul resteth. And so concludes his Narrative.

* Camden, in his Annals of King James, says, Raleigh was brought to London on the 9th of August 1618; but, as I compute from the king's Declarations, it is a mistake. He also in the same article, confirms Stucley's acceptance of the bribe to escape with Raleigh.

HERE the curious reader would probably be willing to know what Stucley had to say for himself upon this business; and this I have also some opportunity of relating from the tract he publish'd after Raleigh's death in his own defence; which tho', for its author's behaviour aforesaid, it has been so much disregarded, that of all the historians general and particular, who have written of Sir Walter Raleigh, and some few of them, whose characters are pretty well known, to his disparagement; I never met with one who has shewn it so much credit as to quote it: yet, as I have found some few passages not altogether useless in explaining other parts of this life, so those, which concern this part, I have thought proper more particularly here to insert, in observance to a good biographical maxim, which enjoyns us, as far as the parts they bear in our narrative will permit, to shew a due respect to the characters of all men, and consequently not, in favour of any, to prostitute our own.

IN this tract, which is properly enough address'd to the king, one of the earliest motives to revenge, in that poor instrument of state, as Stucley no less properly calls himself, against Raleigh, appears to be a pretence, that Raleigh had abridg'd Stucley's father of an incredible dividend in a prize many years before taken at sea,<sup>a</sup> whereof a more particular account has been before given in its proper place; as the last motive will appear to be what Raleigh said of this Stucley in his Dying Speech. But the arguments Stucley makes use of for having betray'd him, are drawn first from Raleigh's having pretended to be poison'd at Sir Edward Parham's house, who was Stucley's kinsman. For he reports Raleigh to have said, "Tho' the gentleman would not hurt me, yet there might be priests that did it: for I remember, after my morning's draught of a cup of ale, which Sir Edward Parham offer'd me in the hall, I felt presently a kind of excoriation in my bowels, as if some jesuite had been the butler." "Now, says Stucley, when I saw the pusses break out upon him at Salisbury, my compassion, I confess, was too credulous to report it." But that being thus deceived himself, and thereby wronging his kinsman, it moved his indignation against Raleigh for abusing both: so that in short, he mitted to him for the bringing up of Sir Walter Raleigh, and the scandalous aspersions cast upon him for the same. 4to. 1618, p. 8.

drew Raleigh to his destruction by a lie, because he had induced Stucley to asperse his kinsman with one. And tho' divinity would not, as Stucley owns, yet reason of state would hold it lawful to lie for the discovery of treason, in service to the commonwealth. Then he endeavours to reconcile himself to the commonwealth, by answering the objection of his being so instrumental to the depriving it of so sufficient a member as had not left his equal behind him, in these words: "No man denies but he had many sufficiencies in him: but what were these
 " but so many weapons of practice and danger against the state, if he escaped? being so deeply " tainted in so many points of discontent, dishonesty, and disloyalty. He knew, as he had " written, that as in nature, so in policy, a privatione ad habitum not fit regressio. And " therefore being desperate of any fortune here, agreeable to the height of his mind, who can " doubt but he would have made up his fortune elsewhere, upon any terms against his sove" raign and country?"<sup>a</sup> In another place, which relates to Raleigh's last endeavours of escaping, he tells the king, "On the Saturday when I received your majesty's commission by " my cousin Herbert, I received also intelligence by him, that at that instant Raleigh was " flying from my custody without my privity, not having, as yet, made him any semblance
 " of condescent:<sup>b</sup> so that I almost came upon him unawares, even as he was putting on his " false beard, and other disguisements; which declares he did still distrust your goodness,
 " doubtless out of the conscience of his guiltiness, whatever he writ or said to the contrary.
 " And is it any marvel then, that he was angry with me at his death for bringing him back?
 " Besides, being a man, as he was thought, of so great a wit, it was no small grief that a man of " so mean wit as I should be thought to go beyond him. Yea, but you should not have used " such craft to go beyond him. No? Sic ars deluditur arte. Neque enim lex justior ulla est
 " quàm necis artifices arte perire suâ. But why did you not execute your commission bravely " to his apprehension on him in his house? why? my commission was to the contrary, to " discover his pretensions, and to seize his secret papers, &c. And can any honest subject " question my honesty in the performance of such a commission, which tended to discover the " secret intentions of an ill-affected heart to my sovereign? How can any dislike this in me, " and not bewray his own dishonest heart unto the state? Yea, but tho' another might have " done this, yet how might you do it, being his kinsman and his friend? Surely if I had " been so; yet in a publick employment and trust laid upon me, I was not to refuse it, much " less to prefer private kindness and amity before my publick duty and loyalty: for what did
 " I know the dangerous consequence of these matters which were to be discover'd? or who " knows them yet, of those that make themselves my competent judges? But if there were " no kindred or amity between us, as I avow there never was, what bond then might tie me
 " to him, but the tie of compassion to his miseries? which was in my sovereign's heart to " distribute, when he saw time, that did command me, and not in the dispensation of me,
 " nor of any other instrument's power that is to be commanded."<sup>c</sup> These are his arguments; and he concludes his pamphlet with making two humble petitions to his most excellent majesty:
 "First, seeing that I, your poor loyal subject, am burdened and oppressed with the testimony " of a bitter enemy, of a perjur'd and condemned man, against all reason, conscience and " law; that I may have your majesty's leave, to the confirmation of the truth, which I have " avowed to be sufficient; to receive the sacrament upon it in your majesty's chapell." But if he did receive the sacrament, to confirm the truth of his assertions, for this seems to be the meaning of his words, if they have, or were intended to have any; how that would justify the falshood of his actions; and how, his taking of the sacrament would be of any credit to him, who has own'd, that divinity would not hold his practices lawful; or how clear him for the violation of that trust and fidelity he had before taken the sacrament, as we shall hear presently, to maintain, he was not thought casuist, or even instrument of state enough to resolve:
 the last petition is, "That his majesty would be so gracious as to suffer a declaration to come " forth from the state, for the clearing of these matters, and further satisfaction of the world;" which plainly discovers, that this pamphlet, sent out under the name of this instrument, was a mere concerted preparative to the said declaration which so observantly followed it; like a fomentation to supple the minds of the uneasy people, that the sovereign unguent might enter more effectually. But how little satisfaction the said declaration gave, we have already noted:
 and for Stucley's performance, it made not so much as himself easy; being, in his own opinion, so insufficient to deface the black and odious stains of his conduct, that he was forced to write

<sup>b</sup> Manariz's story as before, somewhat discredits this of Stucley's, who seems, before he came with Raleigh to London, to have made some semblance of condescent when the jewel was offer'd him.

an Apology besides; and that was so little regarded, as never to have been thought worthy of the press. Whether his life was more successful than his writings, and how it fared with him after this piece of court-service, may be gathered from several authors. Some historical compurgators of this reign, and consequently no friends to Raleigh's memory, yet own, that Stucley's destiny was suitable to his dealings, being afterwards hang'd, say they, for clipping of gold. <sup>a</sup> But those who had better intelligence, and knew the truth more particularly, have delivered it more perfectly; where they affirm, "That Stucley having, for a bag of money, falsified his faith, which he had confirm'd by the tie of the holy sacrament, he was, before the year " came about, caught clipping the same coin, in the king's own house at Whitehall, which " he had received as the reward of his perfidiousness; for which being condemned to be " hang'd, he was driven to sell himself to his shirt, to purchase his pardon of two knights." " Then (to avoid the sight and scorn of mankind) withdrew himself to a little island in the " Severn sea, called the Isle of Lundy, and there died a poor distracted beggar;" <sup>b</sup> which, as we find it elsewhere sufficiently confirm'd, was in less than two years after Raleigh's death. <sup>c</sup> Thus horribly did the deceiver's reward prove his punishment; and thus we leave this notable monument of improsperous treachery.

RALEGH, as we before mention'd, was now prisoner again in the Tower of London, <sup>Put into the Tower.</sup> being brought thither on Monday morning the 10th of August. About two or three days after, a committee was selected to examine into the aforesaid escape, it being a matter luckily capable, and highly necessary to be enlarg'd upon, in order to fill up the measure of accusation. Such a premeditated flight was therefore declaim'd against as a crime so heavy and so heinous, such a disdain or despair of his majesty's mercy, as was greatly to be expected could never obtain his forgiveness. Then again, for Sir Walter Raleigh to alienate himself thus from his native country by means of a foreign power, was stretch'd out to the idea of a separation as horrid as the breach of some huge rock or promontory from the main land, when its foundation was sap'd and wash'd away by undermining waves.

THE arguments Raleigh now returned to extenuate this mighty transgression, having been by no author transmitted to us, it is not impossible but they were with the rest of his justification before those commissioners, during the time of this his last imprisonment, industriously stifled. There is, notwithstanding, one of his own letters on this subject descended, by means of the press, to us. It is directed, by the error of the editor it seems, to the duke, tho' as yet, no more than marquis of Buckingham, and dated the 14th of October. Herein, says Raleigh, with relation to his late attempted escape, "That which doth comfort my soul in this offence " is, that even in the offence itself, I had no other intent than his majesty's service, and to " make his majesty know that my late enterprize was grounded upon a truth, and which " with one ship speedily set out, I meant to have assured or to have died; being resolved, " as it is well known, to have done it from Plymouth, had I not been restrain'd. Hereby " I hoped, not only to recover his majesty's gracious opinion, but have destroy'd all those " malignant reports which had been spread of me. That this is true, that gentleman whom " I so much trusted, my keeper, and to whom I open'd my heart, cannot but testify; and " wherein, if I cannot be believed living, my death shall witness. Yea, that gentleman " cannot but avow it, that when we came back towards London, I desired to save no other " treasure than the exact description of those places in the Indies. That I meant to go hence " as a discontented man, God, I trust, and my own actions will dissuade his majesty; whom " neither the loss of my estate, thirteen years imprisonment, and the denial of my pardon, " could beat from his service: nor had the opinion of being counted a fool, or rather distract, " by returning as I did, ballanc'd with my love to his majesty's person and estate, any " place at all in my heart.

" It was that last severe letter from the lords for the speedy bringing of me up, and the " impatience of dishonour, that first put me in fear of my life, or enjoying it in a perpetual " imprisonment, never to recover my reputation lost, which strengthened me in my late, and " too late lamented resolution, if his majesty's mercy do not abound; if his majesty do not " pity my age, and scorn to take the extremest and utmost advantage of my errors; if his " majesty, in his charity, do not make a difference between offences proceeding from a life- " saving natural impulsion, without all ill intent, and those of an ill heart; and that your THOUGH all other events and motions in this expedition were now also rack'd and tenter'd by his adversaries ; tho' the commissioners (who were perhaps the same, mention'd in a kind of oblique manner, at the end of the king's Declaration, as witnesses thereof) came now constantly to the Tower, to pick out or catch hold of any thing that might contribute some plausible matter to condemn him ; yet after the examinations, re-examinations, and confrontments of the most discontented persons in the late voyage, none of all the depositions upon oath, that are pretended to have been taken, or were really worm'd out of them, were ever thought so material by the said commissioners, as to have been distinctly brought to light, either in that Declaration or elsewhere, against Sir Walter Raleigh. Much less may we expect to meet with any of the arguments urged by himself in his own defence during this inquisition, or close and private manner of sifting him from so many quarters. And yet, if they had been fairly presented to the publick, it is not thought they could have given the world greater satisfaction, or have cleared him better than what he had just before written, both in his letter to the lord Carew and at the end of his Apology, to prove the authority he had for the late action at Guiana, the integrity of his conduct in it, with the reason and necessity thereof. Wherein it appears, he absolutely depended on the honour of king James to continue now, as he had begun, the maintenance of his right to that country which Raleigh had lawfully possessed for the crown ; at least, so far, as not to renounce or circumvent his own commission ; otherwise, how well he knew that if he made the least opposition to any resistance of his attempt, he was liable to be pursued as an invader ; or, if he returned with any gold, to be persecuted as a plunderer by the Spaniards ; and if he did neither, that he was still no less liable to be accus'd as an impostor by his co-adventurers. But in this latter respect, all suspicion was clearly removed, even from those who by their losses in this voyage would have been most readily prompted to make such reproach, when they found Raleigh prove himself as in these writings, to the face of mankind, such a far greater loser than any of the rest hereby, as was before observed : and as for the other two objections, Raleigh has also made it no less amply evident in the same pieces, how glaringly he must appear to the world, a mere premeditated or designed sacrifice to one of them, if king James should maim his sovereignty of its title to Guiana, or now disclaim'd the undertaking there which he had before authoriz'd. For therein he has shewed, that his majesty was well resolved of his right in those parts bordering the Orenoque to the south, as far as the Amazons, by having formerly given the English leave to plant and inhabit there ; and that his own proposal to go thither, was not accounted of as what would endanger the peace, even by the Spanish ambassador, who pretended it to be needless that Raleigh should carry such strength with him, if he intended no other enterprize, for that he should work any mine there without disturbance ; but had a good reason return'd by Raleigh for that strength, from the example of Sir John Hawkins. Further shewing, that for the Spaniards to set up a town upon the Orenoque, was such a usurpation, and that their king should thereupon call himself king of Guiana, was as unreasonable as if he were to call himself king of Ireland, because he took possession at Smerwick, and built a fort there. Having also shewn, that no peace could be broken there by him, where no peace was maintain'd by the Spaniards, both from their bloody usage of the English, who had lately been to trade there, and from the words in the king of Spain's late letters to the governor ; “ who first “ call'd us enemies, when he hoped to cut us in pieces, says Raleigh, and having sail'd, peace- “ breakers : when to be an enemy and a peace-breaker in one and the same action, is impos“ sible.” <sup>b</sup> Moreover, that here the Spaniards began the first slaughter ; that their town was not burnt by any knowledge or permission of his, nor his directions to the mine followed. Lastly, having observed how little the Spaniards can endure that the English nation should look upon any part of America, being above a fourth part of the whole known world, tho' the hundredth part was never possessed by the Spaniards : and withal, the many ill consequences of acknowledging, that we have offended the king of Spain by landing in Guiana, even to the ruin of our navigation, trade, power, and dominion in this quarter of the globe,

where there was as much room and reason for advancing the honour and riches of England as of any state in christendom; he concludes his Apology with these words, I have said it already, and I will say it again, that if Guiana be not his majesty's, the working of a mine there, and the taking of a town there, had been equally perilous; for, by doing the one, I had rob'd the king of Spain, and been a thief; and, by the other, a disturber or breaker of the peace.

Now it is plain, that king James so much waved his right to Guiana, at least till Raleigh was put to death (for then he assum'd it again, by the power he gave for another expedition to those parts, <sup>a</sup> however, irresolutely, according to custom, he revok'd it) that as we observe in his Declaration, not only the place which Raleigh went to is pretended to be out of his commission, but the title he stood upon, to be no ways compatible with it. Yet so incontestably did Raleigh make it appear, no doubt in his examinations at present, no less than in the writings abovemention'd, that if any peace could be broken where no peace had been maintain'd, it must either be by king James himself, in first granting a commission to plunder another prince (for he knew where Raleigh was going, and no where declines his knowledge that the Spaniards were settled there) and then betraying it to procure a defeat of the very attempt he had empower'd; or else by the Spaniards themselves, in resisting his endeavours to put it in execution; that after all this questioning, canvassing, and heaping up of allegations against him, the council could not think it justifiable to take away Sir Walter Raleigh's life for all that had passed at Guiana. Yet, as he must be put to death, they found a way to appease the Spaniards with his blood, by making this last action at St. Thome the efficient cause, but the obsolete condemnation at Winchester, fifteen years past, the nominal cause of his destruction: as a course whereby both the law would be judicially satisfied, and the title be left, for fear of displeasure, undecided. So in the whole, it was resolved there should be room enough to revoke the king's former mercy, as it appears in his Declaration; and that Raleigh might lose his head upon his former attainder; <sup>b</sup> notwithstanding the repugnancies apparent in such a conclusion to men of penetration;

<sup>a</sup> About a year after the death of Sir Walter Raleigh, king James granted captain Roger North, a commission to inhabit and settle a colony near the river of Amazons in Guiana; but was soon aw'd by Gondomar so much, that, on the 15th of May 1620, he issued a proclamation to recall that gentleman from the said undertaking, and committed his brother, the lord North, to the Fleet prison for halting the said voyage, as may be read in Camden's Annals of that king's reign. Some other little attempts were several years after made there, which may be read of in a manuscript entitled, An exact Narrative of the State of Guiana, and of the English Colony in Surinam, in the Beginning of the War with the Dutch, and of its Actions during the War; with the taking thereof by the Fleet from Zeland: of which some copies are preserved in the Ashmolean and other libraries. But how all this spacious and fruitful country has been since shamefully deserted, by the English especially; the quiet possession there by the Spaniards, to this day, is sufficient witness. Whereupon we cannot forbear reciting here the reflection of a late writer, in an essay, partly before quoted, On the needful Improvements in Trade: wherein, expressing how much he is for promoting merchants to rational and profitable adventures, and sailors to new discoveries, as things most valuable in their nature, solid in their design, and gloriously advantageous in their success, he proceeds thus: "By such adventures and discoveries, all our encrease in colonies and plantations has been produced. 'Twas by such happy attempts, that the famous Sir Walter Raleigh and his assistants, settled the British nation upon the Northern continent of America; and, had he been encouraged, or rather had he not been basely betray'd, he had settled us also upon the Southern continent; and the power of Great Britain in her colonies and islands, in that part of the world, had been superior as well in wealth as in extent of land, and in strength of people, to all the nations of the world that ever settled there. And perhaps, by this time, we had wanted no Assiento to carry Negroes to America; no License to trade to the Gulph of Mexico, but the South-Sea had been our own, and all the wealth and glory of America paid homage to king George. But late, and the ill policies of those times hinder'd; and the golden mountains of Chili, and the silver mines of Pacific, the wealth of the richest part of the world, is sacrificed to the lust and sloth of the poorest, and proudest nation under the sun." See the Humourist, Vol. 2. Ser. 1725, p. 39. Another modern author, in his Address to the South Sea Company, observing this attempt of Sir Walter Raleigh's to have been the greatest enterprize that ever was undertaken by any private person; how much it would be to the glory of the said Company to bring it to perfection; how much it was to the infamy of that age in which this great man suffer'd, that such an enterprize was not only discourag'd, but even betray'd to the Spaniard, and this gallant gentleman exposed to ruin; also how just a reproach to this nation ever since, that such a part of the world, so timely and so effectually discover'd to us, has not been made our own, and all those nations, who would submit to us, and be assistant to the great work, be taken into protection, confederated and made use of in subjecting that inexhaustible treasure to be found there, to the government and crown of Great Britain; he concludes the said Address in these words: "The country is within the patent or charter of the South-Sea Company; the undertaking seems to be their due: their charter begins at the river Orenoque, and none can attempt it without them. If they please to take such a proposal into consideration, the author of these sheets is ready to lay before them a plan or chart of the rivers and shores, the depths of water, and all necessary instructions for the navigation, with a scheme of the undertaking, which he had the honour, about thirty years ago, to lay before king WILLIAM, and to demonstrate how easy it would be to bring this attempt to perfection. If the Company decline it, 'tis then humbly propos'd, that they will give leave to a society of merchants to undertake it under the Company's licence, and on such conditions as may be thought reasonable; of which more shall be said when such a proposal shall be entertain'd by the Company." See an Historical Account of the Voyages and Adventures of Sir Walter Raleigh, 8vo. 1719; from p. 42 to 55.

<sup>b</sup> "A head (says Osborne) of more weight to our court (especially in that dearth of wisdom then raging) than the Infanta could be, notwithstanding that the most general, no less than the least suspected reports, made her alone owner of the greatest beauty, virtue, gallantry and prudence that were at that day extant in womankind! But, as the foolish idolaters were wont to sacrifice the choicest of their children to the devil, the common enemy of humanity; so our king gave up this incomparable jewel to the will of this monster in ambition (the Spaniard) under the pretence of a superannuated transgression, contrary to the opinion of the most honest sort of gentlemen; who maintain'd, that his majesty's pardon lay inclusively in the commission he gave him upon his setting out to sea: it being incongruous that he, who remain'd under the notion penetration ; among whom, Carew Raleigh has very well observ'd thereupon, that his father, was condemn'd for being a friend to the Spaniards, and lost his life by the same sentence, for being their enemy. <sup>a</sup>

A METHOD, however, of dispatching him being thus piec'd out, the king, or those with whom he left the management of this affair when he went upon his progress, appear'd very eager for bringing it to a period. Therefore, as the shortest way, a privy seal was sent to the judges, forthwith to order execution. But they considering there ought to be some face of regularity in the matter, and a little finger in the court of justice to slide it off with as much decency and smoothness as the business would allow of, demur'd upon that extrajudicial manner of proceeding. Therefore, on Friday the 23d of October, there was a conference held upon the form or manner how prisoners, who have been attainted of treason and set at liberty, should be brought to execution, between all the justices of England ; as one of them, judge Hutton tells us : wherein the question being put, “ Whether a privy seal was sufficient, it “ being directed to the justices of the King's Bench, to command them to award execution “ against Sir Walter Raleigh ; or how they should proceed before execution be awarded ? ” It was resolved by all, “ That he ought to be brought to bar, by Habeas Corpus to the lieu- “ tenant of the Tower, and then demanded, if he could say any thing why execution should “ not be awarded ? For the proceedings against him being before commissioners, they are deliver'd “ only into the court of King's Bench, or they might have remain'd in a bag or a chest, and “ no roll made thereof ; and so long time passing, it is not a legal course that he should be “ commanded by a privy seal or great seal to be executed, without being demanded, what “ he hath to say ? For he might have a pardon, or he might say that he was not the same “ person : as if one be outlawed of felony, and taken, he shall not be presently hang'd, but “ he shall be brought to bar, and so demanded, &c. Upon this resolution, a privy seal “ came to the justices of the King's Bench, commanding them to proceed against him accor- “ ding to law.” <sup>b</sup> In what sense he was so proceeded against may be better understood by that notice which on the 24th of October, being the next day, Raleigh received from the com- missioners to prepare for death ; <sup>c</sup> and by his not being suffer'd, when he soon after appear'd, in court, before the judges, according to law, to make any defence of himself for what had been the occasion of his coming thither ; as may be seen by the following abstract of the said proceedings, which I have been favour'd with from authentick copies.

Brought to

ON Wednesday, the 28th of October, Sir Walter Raleigh, at eight o'clock in the morning, was awaked out of a fit of a fever, with summons presently to appear at the King's Bench bar at Westminster ; and, soon after nine o'clock, he was, by writ of Habeas Corpus, brought thither. The writ being deliver'd to the judges by Sir Walter Apsley, and Sir Walter Raleigh's conviction at Winchester read, the attorney, Mr. Henry Yelverton, set forth, “ That the “ prisoner having been fifteen years since convicted of high treason, and then received the “ judgment of death, his majesty, of his abundant grace, had been pleased to shew mercy “ unto him, till now, that justice calls to him for execution. Sir Walter Raleigh (continued “ he) hath been a statesman, and a man, who, in regard to his parts and quality, is to be “ pitied : he hath been as a star at which the world have gazed ; but stars may fall, nay “ they must fall when they trouble the sphere wherein they abide. <sup>d</sup> It is therefore his ma- “ jesty's pleasure now to call for execution of the former judgment, and I now require order “ for the same.” Then the clerk of the crown, Mr. Fanshawe, having read the record of the conviction and judgment, the prisoner, holding up his hand, was asked, “ what he could “ notion of one dead in the law, should, as a general, “ dispose of the lives of others, not being himself master “ of his own. But the Spanish faction, then absolute at “ court, and sole managers of the king's power no less “ than his justice, did so far tender his catholick ma- “ jesty's full satisfaction in the procuring of his death, “ the only man of note left alive who had helped to “ beat them in the year 1588 ; that no absurdity lying in “ the way of his prosecution, could deter them from “ making use of his former condemnation ; remembering, “ withal, how far his wit had puzzled them at Winchester, “ and how much the jury, who condemn'd him there, “ were touch'd in their consciences ; which made it the “ less probable they should be able to impanel one so “ wicked as would do it then. Besides, No peace be- yond the Line, was a belief so riveted in the opinion “ of all, as he could not have been indicted anew, with- “ out the king's producing the original articles, by which “ his accusers would have been convinced of malice, or “ his prince of folly. Memoirs of King James, p. 108.

entitled, A brief Relation of Sir Walter Raleigh's Troubles, &c. where Carew Raleigh's words are, p. 9, as follows.

“ Here justice was indeed blind ! blindly executing one “ and the same person, upon one and the same con- “ demnation, for things contradictory ; for Sir Walter Raleigh was condemn'd for being a friend to the Spaniard, and lost his life for being their utter enemy. “ Thus kings, when they will do what they please, “ please not him they should, God ; and having made “ their power subservient to their will, deprive themselves “ of that just power whereby others are subservient to them.”

<sup>d</sup> So in the copy here chiefly followed, but in one more ancient, this comparison is thus turn'd into a metaphor : Sir Walter Raleigh, in his time, was a star ; yea, and of such nature as shined fair, but out of the necessity of state, like stars, when they trouble the sphere, must indeed fall.

“ say

“ say, why execution should not be awarded against him ?” Raleigh told the lords, “ his voice was grown weak by his late sickness, and an ague he had at that instant upon him, in which he was brought thither ; therefore (as it appears in another copy of these proceedings before refer’d to) desired the relief of a pen and ink.” But the lord chief justice, Sir Henry Montague, telling him “ he spake audibly enough,” he went on to this effect : “ That he hoped the judgment he received to die so long since, could not now be strained to take away his life ; since by his majesty’s commission for his late voyage, it was imply’d to be restor’d, in giving him power as marshal on the life and death of others ; and since he undertook the same to honour his sovereign, and enrich his kingdom with gold, of the ore whereof, this band, said he, hath found and taken in Guiana.” Then beginning to mention by what unavoidable and unblameable means the said enterprize miscarried, the lord chief justice interrupted, and told him, “ whatever he spoke touching his voyage was not to the purpose ; also that his commission could be of no service to him ; that treason was not pardon’d by implication, and that he must say something else to the purpose, otherwise they must proceed to give execution.” <sup>a</sup> Raleigh, then finding whatever he should offer in his own justification would be no way to the purpose, put himself upon the king’s mercy ; yet gave some reasons, “ why he hoped the king would take compassion upon him concerning that judgment which was so long past, in which both his majesty was of opinion, and there were some present who could witness, that he had hard usage.” <sup>b</sup> The lord chief justice advis’d him to the wisdom of submission, and told him, “ he was called to grant execution upon the judgment given fifteen years since ; all which time he had been as a man dead in the law, but the king, in mercy, spared him ; that he might think it heavy if this were done in cold blood ; but it was not so, for new offences had stir’d up his majesty’s justice to revive what the law had formerly cast upon him. I know, continued he, that you have been valiant and wise, and I doubt not but you retain both these virtues, for now you shall have occasion to use them. Your faith hath heretofore been questioned, but I am resolved, you are a good christian ; for your book, which is an admirable work, doth testify as much. I would give you counsel, but I know you can apply unto yourself far better than I am able to give you.” Yet, with the good neighbour in the gospel, he was for pouring some oil into his wounds ; tho’ far was it from yielding the refreshment he promis’d, by reason of the severity wherewith he so sharpened the infusion. “ I give you the oil of comfort, said he, tho’ in respect that I am a minister of the law, mixed with vinegar.” Nay, the judge further gave him, how unnecessary soever he just before own’d it to be, one lecture upon sorrow. Sorrow, said he, will not avail you in some kind ; for were you pained, sorrow would not ease you ; were you afflicted, sorrow would not relieve you ; were you tormented, sorrow would not content you ; and yet the sorrow for your sins would be an everlasting comfort to you.” Then another also upon death. “ You must do as that valiant captain did, said he, who, perceiving himself in danger, said, in defiance of death, Death, thou expectest me ; but, maugre thy spite, I expect thee. Fear not death too much, nor fear death too little ; not too much, lest you fail in your hope ; nor too little, lest you die presumptuously : and here I must conclude my prayers to God for it, and that he would have mercy on your soul.” So he ended with saying, “ Execution is granted.”

RALEGH then desir’d, that he might not be cut off so suddenly ; for that he had something to do in discharge of his conscience, something to satisfy his majesty, and something the world in : he desir’d further, that he might be heard at the day of his death ; and concluded, with calling on “ God to be his judge, before whom he should shortly appear, that he was never disloyal to his majesty ; which I will justify, said he, where I shall not fear the face of any king on earth.” Thus the manuscripts here chiefly followed, conclude ; <sup>c</sup> but in the more ancient copy of these proceedings, Raleigh’s conclusion, to the same sense, is thus more copiously express’d : “ I most humbly beseech your lordships, that you will grant me some time before <sup>a</sup> Another Account relates this passage thus : “ When Raleigh began to justify himself for the late voyage, the lord chief justice silenced him therein, saying, ‘ There was no other matter there in question, but concerning the judgment of death formerly given against him, which, the king’s pleasure was, upon some occasions best known to himself, to have executed, unless he could shew good cause to the contrary.’” See the Proceedings against Sir Walter Raleigh at Westminster, annexed to Sir T. Overbury’s Account of his Arraignment at Winchester, 4to. 1648, p. 26.

Westminster, which is the old MS. I have before me, as above-mention’d, this passage is thus expressed : “ Concerning my judgment at Winchester, I presume, most of you, that now hear me, are resolved how that was obtain’d ; and I know that his majesty was so resolved touching that trial, that if he had not been anew exasperated against me, certain I am, I might (if I could by nature) have lived a thousand and a thousand years, before he would have taken the advantage thereof.”

<sup>c</sup> In a volume of the Harleian manuscripts, 90, C. 7. fol. 439 ; and another manuscript among the collections of the late Mr. Granger.

“ my execution, that I may settle my affairs and my mind more than they yet are ; for I have “ much to do, both for my reputation, conscience and loyalty ; and I would beseech the “ favour of pen, ink and paper, to express myself something thereby, and to discharge my“ self of some trust of worldly matters that were put in me ; which leisure, I beseech you “ think, that I crave not for to gain one minute of life ; for now being old, sickly, in dis“ grace, and certain to go to it, life is wearisome to me. And I do lastly beseech your “ lordships, that, when I come to die, I may have leave to speak freely at my farewell, to “ satisfy the world only, that I was ever loyal to the king, and a true lover of this com- “ monwealth ; for this I will seal with my blood.” So craving their prayers, he was led away to the Gate-house, near the Palace-yard.

THE king was all this while retir'd as it were, or at some remoteness from this tragical scene, and, as I have receiv'd it from particular tradition, in Hertfordshire ; as if he would have diverted himself not only from the sight or report, but even the thoughts of it : <sup>a</sup> yet what an effectual and expeditious hand he had in it, may further appear by his special warrant for the execution ; which was produced, ready sign'd, as if it at Westminster, in a manner, as soon as the sentence was over, being dated the same day, and directed to his chancellor, Verulam. Herein, his gracious majesty, “ dispensing with the manner of execution according to his former judgment, “ and releasing him of the same to be drawn, hang'd and quarter'd, says, our pleasure is, instead “ thereof, to have the head only of the said Sir Walter Raleigh cut off, at or within our palace of “ Westminster : commanding the said chancellor hereupon to direct two several writs under the “ great seal ; one to the lieutenant of the Tower, or his deputy, for the delivery of Sir Walter “ Raleigh to the sheriffs of Middlesex at the said palace ; and the other, to the said sheriffs for
 “ the receiving the said Sir Walter Raleigh from the said lieutenant, and for executing him there ;
 “ for which this to be his warrant and discharge, against us, our heirs and successors for ever.” <sup>b</sup>

WE find, about the same time, some petitions presented to the king in behalf of Sir Walter Raleigh, which were strengthened with the solicitations of some persons in great power and esteem with his majesty ; but shall not wonder at their having no effect with him, to mitigate this peremptory and rigorous doom, if it be true as an author, who had opportunity enough of observing his disposition, and abilities sufficient to give a clear judgment of it, has said thereof, with relation to Sir Walter Raleigh, that “ King James so far participated of the humour
 “ of a pusillanimous prince, as to pardon any sooner than those injur'd by himself.” <sup>c</sup> As for Raleigh, we find not that he harbour'd the least expectation or desire of a reprieve ; for that all the oppressions of age, sickness, obloquy, spoil and loss of all his means, besides the other indignities he now lay under, banish'd every wish of redress in this world, but by that dissolution which puts an end to all worldly miseries, appears pretty evident in the letter he seems to have written but a short time before his death to the king ; in which, he rather acknowledges some former tendencies to favour and compassion, than desires any repetition of them, and gives a very good reason for his having no further prospect of any thing substantial therein, where he says, “ I have not spared my labour, my poor estate, and the hourly hazard of “ my life ; but God hath otherwise disposed of all, and now end the days of my hope.” But if the days of his hope had ended when he landed at Plymouth, the days of his life had probably been augmented to a much greater number. Not, if it had been prolonged into many other acts, that they might have adorn'd it with such unfading renown, as that one whereby with such universal admiration he finish'd it. That letter aforesaid, he concludes with the generous profession of “ being in nothing so miserable, as in that I could never meet with an “ occasion, says he, wherein to be torn in pieces for your majesty's service.” <sup>d</sup> But his majesty chose rather to let his own name and memory be torn in pieces for Raleigh's honour, and not only by all indifferent or impartial judges, but by his own countrymen ; <sup>e</sup> and even by antagonists

<sup>a</sup> In Camden, also it may appear, that the king came not to London to give audience to foreign ambassadors now (as in all other parts of his reign) flocking over, till a day or two after Raleigh's death, then he came privately to Whitehall in the evening ; but seems very restless about this time ; very often in his boots, and hunting to and fro ; sometimes at Outlands, sometimes at Throbbalds, sometimes at Hampton-Court ; not but he found time to dedicate his Meditations on the Lord's Prayer to his favourite Buckingham, in February following ; but how he reconcil'd a certain article in that prayer with the intention of his Declaration aforesaid against Sir Walter Raleigh, about the same time publish'd, I leave for others to compare. The queen, all this while, lay on her death bed ; nay, even when she lay dead, in March following, and before the solemnity of her funerals, the king was so busy in that important affair of his life, the horse-races at New-Market, that he got a violent fit of sickness thereby ; so that it was fear'd his favourite diversion would prove as fatal to him as it was thought a few years after the medicinal applications on that favourite peer aforesaid did.

 “ actings, king James suffer'd much in the opinion of “ all people, by his strange way of using one of the great“ est men of that age, Sir Walter Raleigh ; against whom “ the proceedings at first were much censur'd, but the “ last

antagonists to one another in other parts of history, than suffer any mercy to interfere with that sordid but deceitful, and soon after derided pursuit of a profitable alliance with the crown of Spain.

WHETHER any such conditions were offer'd him at this time to lengthen the short line of an uncomfortable existence, which were either so extortionate as Raleigh could not comply with them, or so base and detestable as to be worse than death, the particulars are not come to light; unless some glimpses thereof may be discerned in that Epigram he wrote a little while before his end, in allusion to the light of a candle: which is as follows.

Cowards may fear to die, but courage stout,
Rather than live in snuff, will be put out.

MOREOVER, how sublimely his thoughts were now sequester'd or elevated from all worldly considerations, and with what serenity, what steadiness, he did in a manner possess the joys of a better state before he could be driven to it, is visible in that poem he wrote about the same time, on the pilgrimage his soul was suddenly to make to the regions of eternity, which concludes with this distich:

Of death and judgment, heaven and hell,
Who often thinks, must needs die well.

AND that his faith was no less steadfast in the hopes of a resurrection, we are as convincingly assur'd by those verses which, this last night of his life, he probably wrote also here, in the Gate-house; they being found there in his bible; and, according to the most ancient copies I can meet with, pen'd in these words:

Even such is Time! who takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have;
And pays us but with earth and dust:
Who, in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wander'd all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.
But from that earth, that grave and dust,
The Lord shall raise me up, I trust.

THE next morning, being Thursday the 29th of October, and the lord mayor's day, Sir Walter Raleigh was conducted, by the sheriffs of Middlesex, to the old Palace-yard in Westminster, where there was a large scaffold erected before the parliament-house for his execution. He had on, a wrought night-cap under his hat; a ruff band; a black, wrought velvet night-gown over a hair-colour'd sattin doublet, and a black, wrought waist-coat; a pair of black, cut, taffety breeches, and ash-colour'd silk stockings. He mounted the scaffold with a cheerful countenance, and saluted the lords, knights, and gentlemen of his acquaintance there present. Then proclamation being made by an officer for silence, he introduced his speech with informing them, that as he was yesterday taken out of his bed in a strong fit of a fever, which much weaken'd him, and whose untimeliness forbearing no occasion or place, he expected it again to day: therefore did first implore God, that he would preserve him from the interruptions thereof at this time, and next, desir'd the audience, if any disability of voice or dejection of countenance should appear in him, that they would impute it rather to the disorder of his body than any dismaiedness of mind. Then pausing a little, he sat down, and directed himself towards a window, where the lords Arundel, Northampton, Doncaster, with other nobles were sitting, and begun his speech. But they being at some distance from the scaffold, he apprehended they did not plainly distinguish his words, therefore said, he would strain his voice, for that he would willingly have them hear him. To which the lord Arundel answer'd, * last part of them was thought both barbarous and ill-gal. A little further, speaking of the same king, he says, "His reign, in England, was a continual course of mean practices: the first condemnation of Sir Walter Raleigh was very black; but the executing him after so many years, and after an employment that had been given him, was counted a barbarous sacrificing him to the Spaniards." History of his own Times, vol. 1. c. 24, fol. 16 and 17. And a late historian, who was otherwise a great opposer of bishop Burnet, yet agrees with him in this particular; where speaking of the artifices by which king James was prevail'd on to put the gallant Raleigh to death, he says, however, he thinks, it might result more from want of courage than from cruelty, that "The action was inexcusable; being not more unjust than mean-spirited, and one of the greatest blemishes in this reign." See A short View of the History of England, &c. By Bevil Higgons, Esq; 8vo. 1734. p. 234.

they would rather come down to the scaffold ; which he, and some others did. Then Sir Walter Raleigh, having saluted them severally, began again, as follows.

His last Speech.

“ I THANK God, that he has sent me to die in the light and not in darkness. I likewise “ thank God, that he has suffer’d me to die before such an assembly of honourable witnesses, “ and not obscurely in the Tower ; where, for the space of thirteen years together, I have “ been oppress’d with many miseries. And I return him thanks, that my fever hath not taken “ me at this time, as I prayed to him it might not, that I might clear myself of some ac“ cusations unjustly laid to my charge, and leave behind me the testimony of a true heart “ both to my king and country.

“ THERE are two main points of suspicion that his majesty hath conceived against me, “ and which, I conceive, have specially hastned my coming hither ; therefore I desire to “ clear them to your lordships, and resolve you in the truth thereof. The first is, that his “ majesty hath been inform’d, I have had some plot or confederacy with France, for which “ he had some reasons, tho’ grounded upon a weak foundation. One was, that when I re-“ turn’d to Plymouth, I endeavoured to go to Rochel, which was because I would fain have “ made my peace before I came to England. Another reason was, that again I would have “ bent my course to France, upon my last intended escape from London, being the place “ where I might have the best means of making such peace, and the best safeguard during “ that terror from above. These, join’d with the coming of the French agent to my house “ here in London, only to confer about my said voyage, together with the report of my “ having a commission from the king of France, might occasion my being so suspected in “ this particular, and his majesty to be so displeased with me. But this I say ; for a man
“ to call God to witness at any time to a falsehood, is a grievous sin. To call him as witness
“ to a falsehood at the point of death, when there is no time for repentance, is a crime far “ more impious and desperate ; therefore, for me to call that Majesty to witness an untruth, “ before whose tribunal I am instantly to appear, were beyond measure sinful, and without “ hope of pardon. I do yet call that great God to witness, that, as I hope to see him, to “ be saved by him, and live in the world to come, I never had any plot or intelligence
“ with the French king ; never had any commission from him, nor saw his hand or seal ; “ that I never had any practice or combination with the French agent, nor ever knew or “ saw such a person, till I met him in my gallery unlook’d for. If I speak not true, O “ Lord, let me never enter into thy kingdom.

“ THE second suspicion or imputation was, that his majesty hath been inform’d, I had “ spoken disloyally of him. The only witness of this was, a base Frenchman, a runnagade, “ a chymical fellow, whom I soon knew to be perfidious ; for being drawn by him into the “ action of freeing myself at Winchester, in which I confess my hand was touch’d, he, being “ sworn to secrecy over-night, reveal’d it the next morning. ’Tis strange, that so mean a “ fellow could so far encroach himself into the favour of the lords ; and, gaping after some “ great reward, could so falsely accuse me of seditious speeches against his majesty, and be “ so credited. But this I here speak, it is no time for me to flatter or to fear princes, I, who “ am subject only unto death : and for me, who have now to do with God alone, to tell a “ lye to get the favour of the king were in vain : and yet, if ever I spake disloyally or “ dishonestly of the king, either to this Frenchman or any other ; ever intimated the least “ thought hurtful or prejudicial of him, the Lord blot me out of the book of life.

“ I CONFESS, I did attempt to escape, and it was only to save my life. I likewise confess, “ that I feigned myself to be indisposed at Salisbury ; but I hope it was no sin ; for the “ prophet David did make himself a fool, and suffer’d spittle to fall upon his beard to escape “ from the hands of his enemies, and it was not imputed unto him as a sin : what I did, “ was only to prolong time, till his majesty came, in hopes of some commiseration from “ him.

“ BUT I forgive that Frenchman ; and likewise Sir Lewis Stucley, the wrongs he hath done “ me with all my heart ; for I have received the sacrament this morning of Mr. Dean, and “ I have forgiven all men ; but, in charity to others, am bound to caution them against him,
“ and such as he is. For Sir Lewis Stucley, my keeper and kinsman, hath affirmed, that I “ should tell him, my lord Carew and my lord of Doncaster here, did advise me to escape ;
“ but I protest before God, I never told him any such thing ; neither did these lords advise “ me to any such matter. It is not likely that I should acquaint two privy-counsellors of “ my escape ; nor that I should tell him, my keeper, it was their advice ; neither was there “ any

“ any reason to tell it him, or he to report it ; for it is well known, he left me six, eight, “ or ten days together alone, to go whither I listed, while he rode about the country. He “ further accus’d me, that I should shew him a letter, whereby I did signify, that I would “ give him ten thousand pounds to escape ; but God cast my soul into everlasting fire if ever
 “ I made such proffer of ten thousand pounds, or one thousand pounds ; but indeed, I shewed “ him a letter, that if he would go with me, there should be order taken for the discharge “ of his debts when he was gone ; neither had I one thousand pounds, for, if I had, I could “ have made my peace better with it otherwise than by giving it Stucley. Further, he gave “ out, when I came to Sir Edward Parham’s house, who had been a follower of mine, and “ gave me good entertainment, I had there received some dram of poison. When I answer’d “ that I feared no such thing, for I was well assur’d of those in the house ; and therefore wished “ him to have no such thought. Now I will not only say, that God is the God of revenge, “ but also of mercy ; and I desire God to forgive him, as I hope to be forgiven.” Then casting his eye upon his note of remembrance, he went on thus :

“ It was told the king, that I was brought perforce into England ; and that I did not “ intend to return again. Whereas captain Charles Parker, Mr. Tresham, Mr. Leak, and “ divers others that knew how I was dealt withal by the common foldiers, will witness to “ the contrary. They were an hundred and fifty of them who mutiny’d against me, “ and sent for me to come to them ; for unto me they would not come. They kept me “ close prisoner in my cabin, and forced me to take an oath, that I would not go into “ England without their consent, otherwise they would have cast me into the sea. After I “ had taken this oath, I did, by wine, gifts, and fair words, so work upon the master-“ gunner, and ten or twelve of the faction, that I won them to desist from their purposes, “ and intended, when I returned home, to procure their pardon ; in the mean while pro“ posed, that I would dispose of some of them in Ireland ; to which they agreed, and would “ have gone into the north parts, from which I dissuaded them, and told them, they were “ Red-shanks who inhabited there, so drew them to the south ; and the better to clear myself “ of them, was forced to get them a hundred and fifty pounds at Kingsale, otherwise I had “ never got from them.

“ THERE was a report also, that I meant not to go to Guiana at all ; and that I knew not
 “ of any mine, nor intended any such matter, but only to get my liberty, which I had not “ the wit to keep. But it was my full intent to go for gold, for the benefit of his majesty, “ myself, and those who went with me, with the rest of my countrymen : tho’ he that knew
 “ the head of the mine, would not discover it when he saw my son was slain, but made him“ self away.” Then turning to the earl of Arundel, he said, “ My lord, you being in the “ gallery of my ship at my departure, I remember you took me by the hand, and said, you “ would request one thing of me ; which was, whether I made a good voyage or a bad, that “ I would return again into England ; which I then promis’d, and gave you my faith I “ would.” So you did, said his lordship, ’tis true, and they were the last words I said to “ you.” Another slander was raised of me, that I should have gone away from them, and “ have left them at Guiana ; but there were a great many worthy men, who accompanied me “ always, as my serjeant-major, and divers others (whom he nam’d) that knew it was none “ of my intention. Also it hath been said, that I stinted them of fresh water ; to which I “ answer, every one was, as they must be in a ship, furnish’d by measure, and not according “ to their appetites. This course all seamen know must be used among them, and to this “ strait were we driven. Another opinion was held, that I carried with me sixteen thousand “ pieces of gold ; and that all the voyage I intended, was but to gain my liberty, and this “ money into my hands : but, as I shall answer it before God, I had no more in all the “ world, directly or indirectly, than one hundred pounds ; whereof I gave about forty-five “ pounds to my wife. But the ground of this false report was, that twenty thousand pounds “ being adventured, and but four thousand appearing in the surveyor’s books, the rest had “ my hand to the bills for divers adventures ; but, as I hope to be saved, I had not a “ penny more than one hundred pounds. These are the material points I thought good to “ speak of ; I am at this instant to render my account to God, and I protest, as I shall “ appear before him, this that I have spoken is true.

“ I will borrow but a little time more of Mr. Sheriff, that I may not detain him too “ long ; and herein I shall speak of the imputation laid upon me through the jealousy of “ the people, that I had been a persecutor of my lord of Effex ; that I rejoiced in his death, “ and stood in a window over-against him when he suffer’d, and putt’d out tobacco in de-

“ fiance of him ; when as, God is my witness, that I shed tears for him when he died
 “ and, as I hope to look God in the face hereafter, my lord of Essex did not see my face a
 “ the time of his death ; for I was far off, in the armory, where I saw him, but he saw no “ me. ’Tis true, I was of a contrary faction ; but I take the same God to witness, that I “ had no hand in his death, nor bare him any ill affection, but always believed it would be “ better for me that his life had been preserved ; for after his fall, I got the hatred of those “ who wished me well before : and those who set me against him, set themselves afterwards “ against me, and were my greatest enemies : and my soul hath many times been grieved, “ that I was not nearer to him when he died ; because, as I understood afterwards, he asked “ for me at his death, and desired to have been reconciled to me.

“ AND now I entreat, that you all will join with me in prayer to that great God of hea“ ven, whom I have grievously offended, being a man full of all vanity, who has lived a “ sinful life in such callings as have been most inducing to it ; for I have been a soldier, a “ sailor, and a courtier, which are courses of wickedness and vice ; that his Almighty Good“ ness will forgive me ; that he will cast away my sins from me ; and that he will receive me “ into everlasting life : so I take my leave of you all, making my peace with God.” <sup>a</sup>

THEN proclamation being made, that all men should depart the scaffold, he prepared himself for death, giving away his hat and cap and money to some attendants who stood near him. When he took leave of the lords and other gentlemen, he intreated the lord Arundel to desire the king, that no scandalous writings to defame him might be publish’d after his death. Concluding, I have a long journey to go, therefore must take my leave. Then having put off his gown and doublet, he call’d to the headsmen to shew him the ax, which not being suddenly done, he said, I pr’ythee let me see it. Dost thou think that I am afraid of it ? Having finger’d the edge of it a little he return’d it, and said, smiling, to the sheriff, This is a sharp medicine, but it is a sound cure for all diseases ; and having intreated the company to pray to God to assist and strengthen him, the executioner kneeled down and asked him forgiveness ; which Raleigh, laying his hand upon his shoulder, granted. Then being asked, which way he would lay himself on the block, he answer’d, So the heart be right, it is no matter which way the head lies. As he stoop’d to lay himself along, and reclined his head, his face being towards the east, the headsmen spread his own cloak under him. After a little pause, he gave the sign that he was ready for the stroke by lifting up his hand, and his head was struck off at two blows, his body never shrinking or moving. His head was shewed on each side of the scaffold, and then put into a red leather bag, and, with his velvet night-gown thrown over it, was afterwards conveyed away in a mourning coach of his lady’s. His body, as we are told, was buried hard by, in the chancel of St. Margaret’s church, near the altar ; but his head was long preserved in a case by his widow, for she survived him twenty-nine years, as I have found by some anecdotes remaining in the family ; and after her death, it was kept also by her son Carew, with whom it is said to have been buried. <sup>b</sup>

Beheaded.

THUS

<sup>a</sup> This last speech of Raleigh’s is taken partly from an old MS. copy in the Harleian library, and another in MS. also before me, but, principally, from three of the most ancient copies we have of it in print, at the end of Overbury’s Narrative of his Arraignment, and in his Remains ; each supplying something the others are wanting in, yet none varying considerably from the rest, either in form of expression, or matter of fact. From thence also, the succeeding particulars above of his behaviour at his death are drawn. Sir Walter Raleigh was not content with pronouncing of this speech, but left a summary of it, signed at this time by his own hand. This we have but one copy of in print, and it is, at the end of his Apology, as follows. Sir Walter Raleigh’s Answer to some Things at his Death. “ I did “ never receive any direction from my lord Carew to make “ my escape, nor did I ever tell Stucley any such thing. I did “ never name my lord Hay and my lord Carew to Stucley “ in other words or sense than as my honourable friends, “ among other lords. I did never shew unto Stucley any “ letter wherein there was rocco named, or any one “ pound ; only I told him, that I hoped to procure the “ payment of his debts in his absence. I never had “ commission from the French king. I never saw the “ French king’s hand or seal in my life. I never had “ any plot or practice with the French, directly or in“ directly, nor with any other prince or state unknown “ to the king. My true intent was, to go to a mine of “ gold in Guiana ; it was not feign’d ; but it is true, that “ such a mine there is, within three miles of St. Thome.
 “ I never had in my thought to go from Trinidad and “ leave my companies to come after to the savage island, “ as Hatby Fearn hath falsely reported. I did not carry “ with me a hundred pieces. I had with me about sixty, and “ brought back near the same number. I never spake

 “ to the French Manourie any one disloyal word or disho“ nourable speech of the king ; nay, if I had not loved “ the king truly, and trusted in his goodness, somewhat “ too much, I know that I had not now suffer’d death.

“ These things are most true, as there is a God, and “ as I am now to appear before his tribunal seat ; where “ I renounce all mercy and salvation if this be not truth.
 “ At my death, W. RALEIGH.”

<sup>b</sup> However it was thought by Anthony Wood, as was observed in a former note, that the said Carew Raleigh was buried at Westminster in the same grave with his father ; it is asserted, at West-Horsey, in Surrey, which was his seat, that the said son was buried there. And they have a tradition, that when he was inter’d, the head of Sir Walter Raleigh, which had been kept by him, was then put into the grave with his corpse. And I have seen a letter concerning such of the Raleghs as were baptized or buried at Horsey aforesaid, written by William Nicholas, Esq; who resides upon that estate, to a friend ; wherein that ingenious gentleman “ does verily believe,
 “ the head he saw dug up there in 1703, from the side “ of a grave where a Carew Raleigh had been buried, “ was that of Sir Walter Raleigh ; there being no bones
 “ of a body to it, nor room for any, the rest of that side “ of the grave being firm chalk.” All we shall mention more of Sir Walter Raleigh’s head, is, the story remem-ber’d

THUS have we seen how Sir Walter Raleigh, after a shining and conspicuous series of actions against the enemies of his country, and for the improvement of navigation as well as the enlargement and enrichment of the British empire, under one sovereign, was deprived of his liberty, his estate, and his life under another; how Sir Walter Raleigh, who had been one of the greatest scourges of Spain, was made a sacrifice to it; how the services of Sir Walter Raleigh, I say, in camp, in court, by land, by sea, with sword and pen, were an honour to queen Elizabeth's reign; and how his sufferings at Winchester, at Westminster, by imprisonment, by law, with slander and the ax, were the disgrace of king James's. Writers vary in their accounts of his age; but the most credible historians inform us, that he was sixty six years old at his execution. <sup>a</sup> Yet was it conjectured, by the extraordinary effusion of blood from his veins, that he had stock and strength enough left of nature to have survived many years. "His death was managed by him, as one author has observed, with so high and religious a resolution, as if a Roman had acted a Christian, or rather a Christian a Roman?" <sup>b</sup> and this is confirm'd by Sir Richard Hutton's evidence, who says, "He died in a good and religious manner; spake much, and without any fear of death submitted himself to the block; by his death he gained great reputation in this life, and, by the grace and mercy of God, remission of his sins and eternal life hereafter." <sup>c</sup>

AND now, since it is time to close the scene, "let this glorious and gallant cavalier, whose enemies have confess'd he was one of the weightiest and wisest men that this island ever bred, rest in his grave, and may his virtues live in posterity;" <sup>d</sup> whom to inspire therewith, the felicities of commemoration, however here disposed of, seem to have signally combin'd; having transmitted many ample testimonies, how emulous the harmony of record and the spirit of communication have been to restore those honours to his memory which were torn from his person; and make historical compensation for such honourable calamities: and that so early, that from this speedy growth of his fame, through his extraordinary merits and misfortunes, the learned and judicious Mr. Nathanael Carpenter, who wrote but few years after his death, drew that comprehensive character which has so much engaged the concurrence of all succeeding writers; where he says, Who hath not known or read of that prodigy of wit and fortune, Sir WALTER RALEGH? A man unfortunate in nothing else but in ber'd by Osborne and Fuller; who tell us, that Mr. Edward Wiemark, a wealthy citizen, great news-monger, and constant Paul's-walker, hearing there, the news of Sir Walter Raleigh's death the day he was beheaded, and saying, among other things, His head would do very well upon the shoulders of Sir Robert Naunton, then secretary of state, was complain'd of, and summon'd to the privy council; where he pleaded, that he intended no disrespect to Mr. Secretary, only spake in reference to the old proverb, that Two heads were better than one; so for the pretent was dismiss'd. Not long after, when rich men were call'd upon for a contribution to St. Paul's cathedral, Wiemark, at the council-table, subscribed a hundred pounds. But Mr. Secretary said, Two hundred are better than one, you know, Mr. Wiemark; which, between fear and charity, he was fain to subscribe.

<sup>c</sup> See Hutton's Reports, as before. Nor only in prose, but in verse we have several testimonies of Sir Walter Raleigh's heroick comportment at his death. I have seen three or four epitaphs on him highly extolling the same, in print; whereof one ends thus:

Heaven hath his soul, the world his fame,
The grave his corpse, Stuckey his shame.

But there is an Elegy, written upon Sir Walter Raleigh, by Dr. Henry King, afterwards bishop of Chichester, which, tho' printed among the said prelate's poems in 8vo. 1657, has been so little known to any who have written of Sir Walter Raleigh, that I chuse rather to repeat that than any other in this place; and it is as follows.

I will not weep, for 'twere as great a sin
To shed a tear for thee as to have been An actor in thy death: thy life and age
Was but a various scene on fortune's stage,
With whom thou tugg'dst and strov'st e'en out of breath
In thy long toil; ne'er matter'd till thy death;
And then, despite of trains and cruel wit,
Thou did'st at once subdue malice and it.
I dare not then to blast thy memory,
As I say, I do lament, or pity thee.

Were I to chuse a subject to bestow
My pity on, he should be one as low
In spirit as desert: that durst not die,
But rather were content by slavery To purchase life. Or I would pity those Thy most industrious and friendly foes,
Who, when they thought to make thee scandal's story
Lent thee a swifter flight to heav'n and glory:
Who thought, by cutting off some wither'd days,
Which thou couldst spare them, to eclipse thy praise;
Yet gave it brighter foil, made thy ag'd fame
Appear more white and fair, than foul their shame.
And did promote an execution,
Which, but for them, nature and age had done.
Such worthless things as these were only born
To live on pity's alms, too mean for scorn.
Thou diest an envied wonder, whose high fate
The world must still admire, scarce imitate!

Among the later poems which have been written upon him, since here is not room for Dr. S. Bowden's ingenious verses inscrib'd to Miss RALEGH, who is a direct descendant, and now living at Salisbury, I shall here recite only the conclusion of major Richardson Pack's Prologue to Dr. Sewall's Tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh, as containing a most notable admonition to succeeding times.

Jealous of virtue that was so sublime,
His country damn'd his merit as a crime.
The traitor's doom did on the patriot wait:
He sav'd—and then he perish'd by the state.
A patient MONARCH, too securely wise,
Unhappy kings, they see with others eyes!
Weakly consented to the guilty deed,
And made three kingdoms in their CHAMPION bleed.
BRITONS, by this EXAMPLE taught, unite;
Wound not the publick out of private spite.
To great achievements, just rewards allow;
Nor tear the laurel from the victor's brow.
Exert your vigor in the nation's cause,
But grudge no rival his deserv'd applause.
Safely we may defy MADRID or ROME,
If no sly GONDOMAR prevails at HOME.

the greatness of his wit and advancement! whose eminent worth was such, both in domestick policy, foreign expeditions and discoveries; in arts and literature, both practick and contemplative, that it might seem at once to conquer both example and imitation.<sup>a</sup> But lest a private judgment should be suspected, more liable to the ignorance of a stranger, or the affection of a friend; and that there may be no room left to doubt either of such manifold worth in Sir Walter Raleigh, or that it was all made a sacrifice of state to the enemies and deceivers of the state, we have reserved, as most convincing, the acknowledgments of an enemy, who made him that sacrifice, here to conclude with. For king James, soon after Raleigh's execution, beginning to see how he was, and would be deluded by the Spaniard, made one of his ministers write to his agent in Spain, to let that state know, they should be look'd upon as the most unworthy people in the world, if they did not now act with sincerity, since his majesty had given so many testimonies of his; and now of late, by causing Sir Walter Raleigh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them satisfaction. Further to let them see how, in many actions of late, his majesty had strained upon the affections of his people, and especially in this last concerning Sir Walter Raleigh, who died with a great deal of courage and constancy. Lastly, that he should let them know, how able a man Sir Walter Raleigh was, to have done his majesty service. Yet, to give them content, he hath not spared him; when by preserving him, he might have given great satisfaction to his subjects, and had at command, upon all occasions, as useful a man as served any prince in Christendom.<sup>b</sup>

FIRST, The Commission of Oyer and Terminer, was read by the Clerk of the Crown-Office; and the Prisoner bid hold up his Hand:

And then presently the Indictment, which was in effect as followeth:

THAT he did conspire, and go about to deprive the King of his Government, to raise up Sedition within the Realm, to alter Religion, to bring in the Roman Superstition, and to procure foreign Enemies to invade the Kingdom. That the Lord Cobham, the 9th of June last, did meet with the said Sir Walter Raleigh in Durham House, in the Parish of St. Martin's in the Fields, and then and there had Conference with him how to advance Arabella Stuart to the Crown and royal Throne of this Kingdom; and that then and there it was agreed, That Cobham should treat with Aremberg, Ambassador from the Arch-duke of Austria, to obtain of him 600,000 Crowns, to bring to pass their intended Treasons. It was agreed, That Cobham should go to Albert the Arch-duke, to procure him to advance the pretended Title of Arabella: From thence, knowing that Albert had not sufficient Means to maintain his own Army in the Low-Countries, Cobham should go to Spain to procure the King to assist, and further her pretended Title.

It was agreed, the better to effect all this Conspiracy, That Arabella should write three Letters, one to the Arch-duke, another to the King of Spain, and a third to the Duke of Savoy; and promise there Things: First, To establish a firm Peace between England and Spain. Secondly, To tolerate the Popish and Roman Superstition. Thirdly, To be ruled by them in contracting of her Marriage.

And, for the effecting these traiterous Purposes, Cobham should return by the Isle of Jersey, and should there find Sir Walter Raleigh, Captain of the said Isle, and take Counsel of Raleigh for the distributing of the aforesaid Crowns, as the Occasion or Discontentment of the Subjects should give Cause and Way.

And further, That Cobham and his Brother Brook met on the 9th of June last, and Cobham told Brook all these Treasons: To the which Treasons Brook gave his Assent, and did join himself to all these; and after, on the Thursday following, Cobham

c c c c

Cobham and Brook did speak these Words; That there would never be a good World in England, till the King (meaning our Sovereign Lord) and his Cubs (meaning his Royal Issue) were taken away.

And, the more to disable and deprive the King of his Crown, and to confirm the said Cobham in his Intents, Raleigh did publish a Book, falsely written against the most just and royal Title of the King, knowing the said Book to be written against the just Title of the King; which Book Cobham after that received of him. Farther, for the better effecting these traitorous Purposes, and to establish the said Brook in his Intent, the said Cobham did deliver the said Book unto him, the 14th of June. And further, the said Cobham, on the 16th of June, for Accomplishment of the said Conference, and, by the traitorous Instigation of Raleigh, did move Brook to incite Arabella to write to the three forenamed Princes to procure them to advance her Title; and that she, after she had obtained the Crown, should promise to perform three Things, viz. 1. Peace between England and Spain. 2. To tolerate with Impunity, the Popish and Roman Superstitions. 3. To be ruled by them three, in the contracting of her Marriage.

To these Motions, the said Brook gave his Assent; and for the better effecting of the said Treasons, Cobham, on the 17th of June, by the Instigation of Raleigh, did write Letters to Count Aremberg, and did deliver the said Letters to one Matthew de Lawrence, to be delivered to the said Count, which he did deliver, for the obtaining of 600,000 Crowns; which Money, by other Letters, Count Aremberg did promise to perform the payment of; and this Letter Cobham received the 18th of June. And then did Cobham promise to Raleigh, that when he had received the said Money, he would deliver 8000 Crowns to him; to which Motion he did consent; and afterwards Cobham offered Brook, that after he should receive the said Crowns, he would give to him 10000 thereof; to which Motion Brook did assent.

To the Indictment, Sir Walter Raleigh pleaded Not Guilty.

The JURY.

Sir Ralph Conisby, Knt.	Thomas Walker, Esq;
Sir Thomas Fowler, Knt.	Thomas Whitby, Esq;
Sir Edward Peacock, Knt.	Thomas Highgate, Gent.
Sir William Rowe, Knt.	Robert Kempton, Gent.
Henry Goodyer, Esq;	John Chawkey, Gent.
Roger Wood, Esq;	Robert Brumley, Gent.

Sir Walter Raleigh was asked, whether he would take Exceptions to any of the Jury.

Raleigh. I know none of them; they are all Christians and honest Gentlemen; I except against none.

E. Suff. You Gentlemen of the King's learned Council, follow the same Course as you did the other Day.

Raleigh. My Lord, I pray you, I may answer the Points particularly, as they are delivered, by reason of the Weakness of my Memory and Sick-ness.

Popham, Chief Justice. After the King's learned Council have delivered all the Evidence, Sir Walter, you may answer particularly to what you will.

Heale, the King's Serjeant at Law. You have heard of Raleigh's bloody Attempts, to kill the King and his royal Progeny, and, in place thereof, to advance one Arabella Stuart. The Particulars of the Indictment are these: First, That Raleigh met with Cobham the 9th of June, and had Conference of an Invasion, of a Rebellion, and an Insurrection, to be made by the King's Subjects, to depose the King, and to kill his Children, poor Babes, that never gave Offence: Here is Blood, here is a new King and Governor. In our King consists all our Happiness, and the true Use of the Gospel; a Thing, which we all wished to be settled after the Death of the Queen. Here must be Money to do this, for Money is the Sinew of War. Where should that be had? Count Aremberg must procure it of Philip King of Spain, 5 or 600,000 Crowns, and out of this Sum, Raleigh must have 8000; then there must be Friends to effect this. Cobham must go to Albert, Arch-duke of Austria, from whom Aremberg was Ambassador at that time in England. And what then? He must persuade the Duke to assist the pretended Title of Arabella. From thence Cobham must go to the King of Spain, and persuade him to assist the said Title. Since the Conquest, there was never the like Treason. But out of whose Head came it? Out of Raleigh's, who must also advise Cobham to use his Brother Brook to incite the Lady Arabella to write three several Letters, as aforesaid in the Indictment; all this was on the 9th of June. Then three Days after, Brook was acquainted with it: After this, Cobham said to Brook, 'Twill never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs are taken away. Afterwards Raleigh delivered a Book to Cobham, treacherously written against the Title of the King. It appears, that Cobham took Raleigh, to be either a God, or an Idol. Cobham endeavours to set up a new King, or Governor. God forbid, mine Eyes should ever see so unhappy a Change. As for the Lady Arabella, she, upon my Conscience, hath no more Title to the Crown than I have; which, before God, I utterly renounce. Cobham, a Man bred in England, hath no Experience abroad. But Raleigh, a Man of great Wit, Military, and a Sword-man. Now whether these Things were bred in a hollow Tree, I leave to them to speak of, who can speak far better than myself.

Sir Edward Coke, the King's Attorney. I must first, My Lords, before I come to the Cause, give one Caution; because we shall often mention Persons of eminent Places, some of them great Monarchs: Whatever we say of them, we shall but repeat what others have said of them; I mean the capital Offenders in their Confessions: We, professing Law, must speak reverently of Kings and Potentates. I perceive these honourable Lords, and the rest of this great Assembly, are come to hear what hath been scattered upon the Wreck of Report. We carry a just Mind, to condemn no Man, but upon plain Evidence. Here is Mischief, Mischief in summo gradu, exorbitant Mischief. My Speech shall chiefly touch these three Points; Imitation, Supportation, and Defence.

The Imitation of Evil ever exceeds the Precedent; as on the contrary, Imitation of Good ever comes short. Mischief cannot be supported, but by Mischief: Yea, it will so multiply, that it will bring all to Confusion. Mischief is ever underprop'd by Falshood of foul Practices. And because all these things did concur in these Treasons, you shall understand the Main, as before you did the Bye.

The Treason of the Bye, consisteth in these Points: First, That the Lord Grey, Brook, Markham, and the rest, intended by Force in the Night, to surprize the King's Court; which was a Rebellion in the Heart of the Realm, yea, in the Heart of the Heart, in the Court. They intended to make him, that is a Sovereign, subject to their Power, purposing to open the Doors with Musquets and Calivers, and to take also the Prince and Council. Then, under the King's Authority, to carry the King to the Tower, and to make a Stale of the Admiral: When they had the King there, to extort three Things from him. First, A Pardon for all their Treasons. Secondly, A Toleration of the Roman Superstition: Which, their Eyes shall sooner fall out, than they shall ever see; for the King hath spoken these Words in the hearing of many, I will lose the Crown and my Life, before ever I will alter Religion. And Thirdly, To remove Counsellors: In the room of the Lord Chancellor, they would have placed one Watson a Priest, absurd in Humanity, and ignorant in Divinity. Brook, of whom I will speak nothing, Lord Treasurer; the great Secretary must be Markbam, Oculus Patriæ. A Hole must be found in my Lord Chief Justice's Coat. Grey must be Earl Marshal, and Master of the Horse, because he would have a Table in the Court: Marry, he would advance the Earl of Worcester to a higher Place. All this cannot be done without a Multitude. Therefore Watson the Priest telleth a resolute Man, That the King was in Danger of Puritans and Jesuits; so to bring him in blindfold into the Action; saying, That the King is no King till he be crowned, therefore every Man might right his own Wrongs: But he is Rex Natus, his Dignity descends as well as yours, my Lords. Then Watson imposeth a blasphemous Oath, That they should swear to defend the King's Person, to keep secret what was given them in Charge, and seek all Ways and Means to advance the Catholick Religion. Then they intend to send for the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen, in the King's Name, to the Tower, lest they should make any Resistance, and then to take Hostages of them; and to enjoin them to provide for them Victuals and Munition. Grey, because the King removed before Midsummer, had a further Reach, to get a Company of Sword-men to assist the Action: Therefore he would stay, till he had obtain'd a Regiment from Ostend or Austria. So you see, these Treasons were like Sampson's Foxes, which were joined in their Tails, tho' their Heads were severed.

Raleigh. You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray remember, I am not charged with the Bye, being the Treason of the Priest.

Attorney. You are not: My Lords, you shall observe three Things in the Treasons. First, They had a Watch-word (the King's Safety); their Pretence was Bonum in se, their Intent was Malum in se. Secondly, They avouched Scripture; both the Priests had, Scriptum est; perverting and ignorantly mistaking the Scriptures. Thirdly, They avouched the Common Law to prove, That he was no King till he was crowned, alledging a Statute of 13 Eliz. This, by way of Imitation, hath been the Course of all Traytors.

In the 20th of Edward II., Isabella the Queen, and the Lord Mortimer, gave out, That the King's Person was not safe, for the Good of the Church and Commonwealth.

The Bishop of Carlisle did preach on this Text, My Head is grieved; meaning by the Head, the King; that when the Head began to be negligent, the People might reform what is amiss.

In the 3d of Henry IV., Sir Roger Claringdon, accompanied with two Priests, gave out, that Richard II. was alive, when he was dead.

Edward III. caused Mortimer's Head to be cut off, for giving Counsel to murder the King.

The 3d of Henry VII. Sir Henry Stanley found the Crown in the Dust, and set it on the King's Head. When Fitzwater and Garret told him, that Edward V. was alive, he said, If he be alive, I will assist him: But this cost him his Head.

Edmund de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, killed a Man in the Reign of King Henry VII., for which the King would have him hold up his Hand at the Bar, and then pardoned him. Yet he took such Offence thereat, that he sent to the Noblemen, to help to reform the Commonwealth; and then said, he would go to France and get Power there. Sir Roger Compton knew all the Treason, and discovered Windon and others, that were attainted.

He said, there was another Thing that would be stood upon, namely, that they had but one Witness; then he vouched one Appleyard's Case (Temp. Eliz.) a Traytor in Norfolk, who said a Man must have two Accusers. Helmes was the Man that accused him; but Mr. Justice Catlin said, that that Statute was not in force at that Day; his Words were, Thrust her into the Ditch.

Then he went on speaking of Accusers, and made this Difference: An Accuser is a Speaker by Report; when a Witness is he, that upon his Oath shall speak his Knowledge of any Man.

A third sort of Evidence there is likewise, and this is held more forcible than either of the other two; and that is, when a Man, by his Accusation of another, shall, by the same Accusation, also condemn himself, and make himself liable to the same Fault and Punishment: This is more forcible than many Witnesses. So then, so much by way of Imitation. Then he defined Treason: There is Treason in the Heart, in the Hand, in the Mouth, in Consummation; comparing that in Corde to the Root of a Tree; in Ore, to the Bud; in Manu, to the Blossom; and that which is in Consummatione, to the Fruit.

Now I come to your Charge, you of the Jury: The Greatness of Treason is to be considered in these two Things, Determinatione finis, and Electione mediorum. This Treason excelleth in both, for that it was to destroy the King and his Progeny. These Treasons are said to be Crimen læsæ Majestatis; this goeth farther, and may be termed Crimen extirpandæ Regiæ Majestatis & totius Progeniei suæ. I shall not need, my Lords, to speak any thing concerning the King, nor of the Bounty and Sweetness of his Nature, whose Thoughts are innocent, whose Words are full of Wisdom and Learning, and whose Works are full of Honour; altho' it be a true Saying, Nunquam nimis, quod nunquam satis. But to whom do you bear Malice? To the Children?

Raleigh. To whom speak you this? You tell me News I never heard of.

Attorney. Oh Sir, do I; I will prove you the notoriousest Traytor, that ever came to the Bar. After you have taken away the King, you would alter Religion: As you Sir Walter Raleigh have followed them of the Bye in Imitation; for I will charge you with the Words.

Raleigh. Your Words cannot condemn me, my Innocency is my Defence: Prove one of these Things wherewith you have charged me, and I will confess the whole Indictment; and that I am the horriblest Traytor that ever lived, and worthy to be crucified with a thousand thousand Torments.

Attorney. Nay, I will prove all: Thou art a Monster; thou hast an English Face, but a Spanish Heart. Now you must have Money: Aremberg was no sooner in England (I charge thee Raleigh) but thou incitedst Cobham to go unto him, and to deal with him for Money, to bestow on discontented Persons, to raise Rebellion in the Kingdom.

Raleigh. Let me answer for myself.

Attorney.

Attorney. Thou shalt not.

Raleigh. It concerneth my Life.

Lord Chief Justice Popham. Sir Walter Raleigh, Mr. Attorney is but yet in the General; but when the King's Council have given the Evidence wholly, you shall answer every Particular.

Attorney. Oh! do I touch you?

Lord Cecil. Mr. Attorney, when you have done with this general Charge, do you not mean to let him answer to every Particular?

Attorney. Yes, when we deliver the Proofs to be read. Raleigh procured Cobham to go to Aremberg, which he did by his Instigation: Raleigh supped with Cobham before he went to Aremberg; after Supper, Raleigh conducted him to Durham House; from whence Cobham went with Lawrence, a Servant of Aremberg's, unto him, and went in by a Back-way. Cobham could never be quiet until he had entertain'd this Motion, for he had four Letters from Raleigh. Aremberg answered, the Money should be performed, but knew not to whom it should be distributed. Then Cobham and Lawrence came back to Durham House, where they found Raleigh. Cobham and Raleigh went up, and left Lawrence below, where they had secret Conference in a Gallery, and after Cobham and Lawrence departed from Raleigh. Your Jargon was Peace! What is that? Spanish Invasion, Scottish Subversion. And again, you are not a fit Man to take so much Money for procuring of a lawful Peace, for Peace procured by Money is dishonourable. Then Cobham must go to Spain, and return by Jersey, where you were Captain: And then, because Cobham had not so much Policy, or at least Wickedness, as you, he must have your Advice for the distribution the Money. Would you have despoised so good a King, lineally descended of Elizabeth, eldest Daughter of Edward IV: Why then must you set up another? I think you meant to make Arabella a titular Queen, of whose Title I will speak nothing; but sure you meant to make her a Stale: Ah good Lady! you could mean her no good.

Raleigh. You tell me News, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Oh Sir! I am the more large, because I know with whom I deal: For we have to deal to-day with a Man of Wit.

Raleigh. Did I ever speak with this Lady?

Attorney. I will track you out before I have done; Englishmen will not be led by Persuasion of Words, but they must have Books to persuade.

Raleigh. The Book * was written by a Man of your Profession, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. I would not have you impatient.

Raleigh. Methinks you fall out with yourself; I say nothing.

Attorney. By this Book, you would persuade Men, that he is not the lawful King. Now let us consider some Circumstances: My Lords, you know my Lord Cobham (for whom we all lament, and rejoice; lament in that his House, which hath stood so long unspotted, is now ruined: Rejoice, in that his Treasons are revealed) is neither Politician nor Sword-man; Raleigh was both, united in the Cause with him, and therefore Cause of his Destruction. Another Circumstance is, the secret contriving of it. Humphry Stafford claimed Sanctuary for Treason, Raleigh in his Machiavilian Policy hath made a Sanctuary for Treason. He must talk with none but Cobham, because (saith he) one Witness can never condemn me. For Brook said unto Sir Griffith Markham, take heed how you do make my Lord Cobham acquainted; for whatsoever he knoweth, Raleigh the Witch will get it out of him. As soon as Raleigh was examined on one Point of Treason concerning my Lord Cobham, he wrote to him thus; I have been examined of you, and confessed nothing. Further, you sent to him by your trusty Francis Kemish, that one Witness could not condemn; and therefore bad his Lords ship be of good Courage. Came this out of Cobham's Quiver? No: But out of Raleigh's Machiavilian and Devilish Policy! Yea, but Cobham did retract it: Why then did you urge it? Now then see the most horrible Practices that ever came out of the bottomless Pit of the lowest Hell. After that Raleigh had Intelligence that Cobham had accused him, he endeavoured to have Intelligence from Cobham, which he had gotten by young Sir John Peyton: But I think it was the Error of his Youth.

Raleigh. The Lords told it me, or else I had not been sent to the Tower.

Attorney. Thus Cobham, by the Instigation of Raleigh, entred into these Actions: So that the Question will be, Whether you are not the principal Traytor, and he would nevertheless have entred into it? Why did Cobham retract all that same? First, Because Raleigh was so odious, he thought he should fare the worse for his sake. 2dly, He thought thus with himself, if he be free, I shall clear myself the better. After this, Cobham asked for a Preacher to confer with, pretending to have Dr. Andrews; but indeed, he meant not to have him, but Mr. Galloway, a worthy and reverend Preacher, who can do more with the King (as he said) than any other; that he, seeing his constant Denial, might inform the King thereof. Here he plays with the Preacher. If Raleigh could persuade the Lords, that Cobham had no Intent to travel, then he thought all should be well. Here is Forgery. In the Tower, Cobham must write to Sir Thomas Vane, a worthy Man, That he meant not to go into Spain; which Letter Raleigh devised in Cobham's Name.

Raleigh. I will wash my Hands of the Indictment, and die a true Man to the King.

Attorney. You are the absolute Traytor that ever was.

Raleigh. Your Phrases will not prove it, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Cobham writeth a Letter to my Lord Cecil, and doth will Mellis, his Man, to lay it in a Spanish Bible, and to make as tho' he found it by chance. This was after he had Intelligence with this Viper; then he was false.

Lord Cecil. You mean a Letter intended to me; I never had it.

Attorney. No, my Lord, you had it not. You, my Masters of the Jury, respect not the Wickedness and Hatred of the Man, respect his Cause; if he be guilty, I know you will have Care of it, for the Preservation of the King, the Continuance of the Gospel authorized, and the Good of us all.

Raleigh. I do not hear yet, that you have spoken one Word against me; here is no Treason of mine done. If my Lord Cobham be a Traytor, what is that to me?

Attorney. All that he did, was by thy Instigation, thou Viper; for I Thow thee, thou Traytor.

Raleigh. It becometh not a Man of Quality and Virtue, to call me so: But I take Comfort in it, it is all you can do.

Attorney. Have I anger'd you?

Raleigh. I am in no Case to be angry?

* This Book was intitled, A Defence of the Queen's Proceedings, against Mary Queen of Scotland. Written by one Robert Snag. See the arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh. By Sir Thomas Overbury, 4to. 1648.

C. J. Popham. Sir Walter Ralegh, Mr. Attorney speaketh out of the Zeal of his Duty, for the Service of the King, and you for your Life; be valiant on both sides.

Now they proceed to the reading the Proofs.

The Lord Cobham's Examination read.

" He confesseth he had a Passport to go into Spain,
 " intending to go to the Arch-duke, to confer " with him about these Practices; and because " he knew the Arch-duke had not Money to " pay his own Army, from thence he meant to go " to Spain, to deal with the King for the 600,000
 " Crowns, and to return by Jersey; and that no" thing should be done, until he had spoken with " Sir Walter Ralegh, for distribution of the Money
 " to them which were discontented in England.
 " At the first beginning, he breathed out Oaths " and Exclamations against Ralegh, calling him
 " Villain and Traytor; saying, he had never en" tered into these Courses, but by his Instigation,
 " and that he would never let him alone.

Here Mr. Attorney willed the Clerk of the Crown-Office, to read over these last Words again (he would never let him alone.)

The Lord Cobham's Examination.

" Besides, he spake of Plots and Invasions: Of " the Particulars whereof he could give no Ac" count, tho' Ralegh and he had conferred of them,
 " because he was (as he said) confounded with " them. Further, he said, he was afraid of Ra-" legh, that when he should return by Jersey, that " he would have him and the Money to the King.
 " Being examined of Sir Arthur Gorge, he freed " him, saying, They never durst trust him; but " Sir Arthur Savage they intended to use, because " they thought him a fit Man.

Ralegh. Let me see the Examination: This is absolutely all the Evidence can be brought against me; poor Shifts! You Gentlemen of the Jury, I pray you understand this: This is that which must either condemn, or give me Life; which must free me, or send my Wife and Children to beg their Bread about the Streets. This is what must prove me a notorious Traytor, or true Subject to the King. Let me see my Accusation, that I may make my Answer.

Clerk of the Council. I did read it, and shew you all the Examinations.

Ralegh. At my first Examination at Windfor, my Lords asked me, what I knew of Cobham's Practice with Aremberg; I answered negatively: And as concerning Arabella, I protest before God, I never heard one Word of it. If that be proved, let me be guilty of a thousand Treasons. It is a strange thing you will impute that to me, when I never heard so much as the Name of Arabella Stuart, but only the Name of Arabella.

After being examined, I told my Lords, that I thought my Lord Cobham had Conference with Aremberg, I suspected his visiting of him: For after he departed from me at Durham House, I saw him pass by his own Stairs, and passed over to St. Mary-Saviours, where I knew Lawrency a Merchant, and a Follower of Aremberg, and therefore likely to go unto him. My Lord Cecil asked my Opinion concerning Lawrency; I said, That if you do not apprehend Lawrency, it is dangerous, he will fly; if you do apprehend him, you shall give my Lord Cobham Notice thereof. I was asked likewise, Who was the greatest Man with my Lord Cobham? I answered, I knew no Man so great with him, as young Wyat of Kent.

As soon as Cobham saw my Letter to have discovered his Dealing with Aremberg, in his Fury he accused me; but before he came to the Stair-foot he repented him, and said, he had done me wrong. When he came to the End of his Accusation, he added, That if he had brought this Money to Jersey, that I would have delivered him and the Money to the King. Mr. Attorney, You said this never came out of Cobham's Quiver, he is a simple Man: Is he so simple? No: He hath Dispositions of his own, he will not easily be guided by others, but when he has once taken Head in a Matter, he is not easily drawn from it; he is no Babe. But it is strange for me to devise with Cobham, that he should go to Spain, to persuade the King to disburse so much Money, he being a Man of no Love in England, and I having resigned my Room of chiefest Command, the Wardenship of the Stannaries: Is it not strange for me, to make myself Robin Hood, or a Kett, or a Cade; I knowing England to be in better Estate to defend itself than ever it was. I knew Scotland united, Ireland quieted, Denmark assured, which before was suspected. I knew, that having lost a Lady whom Time had surprised, we had now an active King, a lawful Successor. The State of Spain was not unknown to me. I had written a Discourse, which I had intended to present unto the King, against Peace with Spain. I knew the Spaniards had six Repulses, three in Ireland, and three at Sea, and once in 1588 at Cales, by my Lord Admiral. I knew he was discouraged and dishonoured. I knew the King of Spain to be the proudest Prince living; but now he cometh creeping to the King my Master, for Peace. I knew, whereas before he had in his Ports six or seven score Sail of Ships, he hath now but six or seven. I knew of twenty-five Millions he had from his Indies, he hath scarce one left. I knew him so poor, that the Jesuits in Spain, who were wont to have such large Allowance, were fain to beg at the Church-door. Was it ever read or heard, that any Prince should disburse so much Money, without a sufficient Pawn? I knew her own Subjects, the Citizens of London, would not lend her Majesty Money, without Lands in Mortgage. I knew the Queen did not lend the States Money, without Flushing, Brill, and other Towns for a Pawn. And can it be thought, he would let Cobham have so great a Sum?

I never came to the Lord Cobham's, but about Matters of his Profit, as the ordering of his House, paying of his Servants Board-wages, &c. I had of his when I was examined, four thousand Pounds worth of Jewels for a Purchase; a Pearl of three thousand Pounds, and a Ring worth five hundred Pounds: If he had had a Fancy to run away, he would not have left so much to have purchased a Lease in Fee-farm. I saw him buy three hundred Pounds worth of Books, to send to his Library at Canterbury, and a Cabinet of thirty Pounds to give to Mr. Attorney, for drawing the Conveyances; and God in Heaven knoweth, not I, whether he intended to travel. But for that Practice with Arabella, or Letters to Aremberg, or any Discourse with him, or in what Language he spake unto him; if I knew any of these things, I would absolutely confess the Indictment, and acknowledge myself worthy a thousand Deaths.

Cobham's second Examination read.

" The Lord Cobham being required to subscribe to " an Examination, there was shewed a Note under " Ralegh's Hand, the which when he had perused,
 " he paused, and after brake forth into these " Speeches: Oh Villain! Oh Traytor! I will now
 " tell

“ tell you all the Truth: And then said, His Purpose was to go into Flanders and into Spain, for the obtaining the aforesaid Money, and that Raleigh had appointed to meet him in Jersey as he returned home, to be advised of him about the Distribution of the Money.

Popham, Lord Chief Justice. When Cobham answered to the Interrogatories, he made scruple to subscribe; and being urged to it, he said, if he might hear me affirm, that a Person of his Degree ought to set his Hand, he would; I lying then at Richmond, for fear of the Plague, was sent for, and I told he ought to subscribe; otherwise it were a Contempt of a high Nature: *Then he subscribed.** The Lords questioned with him further, and he shewed them a Letter, as I thought written to me, but it was indeed written to my Lord Cecil: He desired to see the Letter again, and then said, Oh Wretch! Oh Traytor! Whereby I perceived you had not performed that Trust he had reposed in you.

Raleigh. He is as passionate a Man as lives, for he hath not spared the best Friends he hath in England in his Passion. My Lords, I take it, he that hath been examined, hath ever been asked at the Time of his Examination, if it be according to his meaning, and then to subscribe. Methinks, my Lords, when he accuses a Man, he should give some Account and Reason of it; it is not sufficient to say, we talked of it. If I had been the Plotter, would not I have given Cobham some Arguments, whereby to persuade the King of Spain, and answer his Objections. I knew Westmorland and Bothwell, Men of other Understandings than Cobham, were ready to beg their Bread.

Sir Thomas Fowler, one of the Jury. Did Sir Walter Raleigh write a Letter to my Lord before he was examined concerning him, or not?

Attorney. Yes.

Lord Cecil. I am in great Dispute with myself, to speak in the Case of this Gentleman: A former Dearness between me and him tied so firm a Knot of my Conceit of his Virtues, now broken by a Discovery of his Imperfections. I protest, did I serve a King that I knew would be displeased with me for speaking, in this Case I would speak, whatever came of it: But seeing he is compacted of Piety and Justice, and one that will not mislike any Man for speaking a Truth, I will answer your Question.

Sir Walter Raleigh was staid by me at Windsor, upon the first News of Copley, that the King's Person should be surprised by my Lord Grey, and Mr. George Brook; when I found Brook was in, I suspected Cobham, then I doubted Raleigh to be a Paraker. I speak not this, that it should be thought, I had greater Judgment than the rest of my Lords, in making this haste to have him examined; Raleigh following to Windsor, I met with him upon the Terrace, and willed him, as from the King, to stay, saying, The Lords had something to say to him: Then he was examined, but not concerning my Lord Cobham, but of the surprising Treason; my Lord Grey was apprehended, and likewise Brook; by Brook we found, that he had given Notice to Cobham of the surprising Treason as he delivered it to us, but with as much Springness of a Brother as he might: We sent for my Lord Cobham to Richmond, where he stood upon his Justification, and his Quality; sometimes being froward, he said he was not bound to subscribe, wherewith we made the King acquainted. Cobham said, if my Lord Chief Justice would say it were a Contempt, he would subscribe; whereof being resolved, he subscribed. There was a Light given to Aremberg, that Lawrency was examined; but that Raleigh knew that Cobham was examined, is more than I know.

Raleigh. If my Lord Cobham had trusted me in the Main, was not I as fit a Man to be trusted in the Bye?

Lord Cecil. Raleigh did by Letters acquaint us, that my Lord Cobham had sent Lawrency to Aremberg, when he knew not he had any Dealings with him.

Lord H. Howard. It made for you, if Lawrency had been only acquainted with Cobham, and not with you. But you knew his whole Estate, and were acquainted with Cobham's Practice with Lawrency; and it was known to you before, that Lawrency depended on Aremberg.

Attorney. 1. Raleigh protesteth against the surprising Treason. 2. That he knew not of the Matter touching Arabella. I would not charge you, Sir Walter, with a Matter of Falshood: You say, you suspected the Intelligence that Cobham had with Aremberg, by Lawrency.

Raleigh. I thought it had been no other Intelligence, but such as might be warranted.

Attorney. Then it was but lawful Suspicion. But to that whereas you said, That Cobham had accused you on Passion, I answer three Ways. 1. I observed when Cobham said, Let me see the Letter again, he paused, and when he did see that Count Aremberg was touched, he cried out, O Traytor! O Villain! now will I confess the whole Truth. 2. The Accusation of a Man on Hear-say, is nothing: Would he accuse himself on Passion, and ruin his Cause and Posterity, out of Malice to accuse you? 3. Could this be out of Passion? Mark the manner of it: Cobham had told this at least two Months before to his Brother Brook, You are Fools, you are on the Bye, Raleigh and I are on the Main, we mean to take away the King and his Cubs; this he delivered two Months before. So mark the Manner and the Matter; he would not turn the Weapon against his own Bosom, and accuse himself to accuse you.

Raleigh. Hath Cobham confessed that?

Lord Chief Justice. This is spoken by Mr. Attorney, to prove that Cobham's Speech came not out of Passion.

Raleigh. Let it be proved that Cobham said so.

Attorney. Cobham saith, he was a long time doubtful of Raleigh, that he would send him and the Money to the King. Did Cobham fear lest you would betray him in Jersey? Then of necessity there must be Trust between you. No Man can betray a Man, but he that is trusted, in my understanding. This is the greatest Argument to prove, that he was acquainted with Cobham's Proceedings. Raleigh hath a deeper Reach than to make himself, as he said, Robin Hood, a Ket, or Cade; yet I never heard that Robin Hood was a Traytor; they say he was an Out-law. And whereas he saith, that our King is not only more wealthy and potent than his Predecessors, but also more politick and wise, so that he could have no Hope to prevail: I answer, There is no King so potent, wise, and active, but he may be overtaken through Treason. Whereas you say, Spain is so poor; discoursing so largely thereof, it had been better for you to have kept in Guiana, than to have been so well acquainted with the State of Spain. Besides, if you could have brought Spain and Scotland to have joined, you might have had hope to prevail. For his six Overthrows, I answer; he hath the more Malice, because Repulses breed desire of Revenge. Then you say, you never talked with Cobham but about Leafes, and letting Lands, and ordering his House; I never knew you Clerk of the Kitchen, &c. If you had fallen on your Knees at first, and confessed the Treason, it had been better for you. You say, he meant to have given me a Cabinet of thirty Pounds; perhaps he thought by those means, to have anticipated me therewith. But you say, all these are Circumstances. I answer, all this Accusation in Circumstance is true: Here now I might appeal to my Lords, that you take hold of this, that he subscribed not to the Accusation.

* This Affection among others, in this Account of the Trial, shews the gross Partiality and Falshood of the Person, who took and published us; for in all the Narratives thereof, it appears, that Cobham would never subscribe the Accusation of Sir Walter Raleigh, which had been extorted from him by the Lords, through his Fear and other Passions.

Lord H. Howard. Cobham was not then pressed to subscribe.

Attorney. His Accusation being testified by the Lords, is of as great Force, as if he had subscribed. Raleigh saith again, if the Accuser be alive, he must be brought Face to Face to speak, and alledges 25 Edw. III. That there must be two sufficient Witnesses that must be brought Face to Face before the accused, and alledgeth 10, and 13 Eliz.

Raleigh. You try me by the Spanish Inquisition, if you proceed only by the Circumstances, without two Witnesses.

Attorney. This is a treasonable Speech.

Raleigh. Evertere hominem justum in causa sua, injustum est: Good my Lords, let it be proved, either by the Laws of the Land, or by the Laws of God, that there ought not to be two Witnesses appointed; yet I will not stand to defend this Point in Law, if the King will have it so; it is no rare thing to be falsely accused. A Judge condemned a Woman in Sarum, for killing her Husband, on the Testimony of one Witness; afterwards his Man confessed the Murder, when she was executed. Who after, being touch'd in Conscience for the Judgment, was used to say, Quod nunquam de hoc facto animam in vita sua purgaret. It is also commanded by the Scripture, Deut. xvii. In ore duorum aut trium testium, &c. and xix. Non stabit unus testis contra aliquem, &c.

If Christ requireth it, as it appeareth, Mat. xviii. If by the Statute, Civil Law, and God's Word, it be required that there must be two Witnesses at the least; bear with me if I desire one.

I would not desire to live, if I were privy to Cobham's Proceedings: I had been a Slave, a Villain, a Fool, if I had endeavoured to set up Arabella, and refused so gracious a Lord and Sovereign. But urge your Proofs.

Lord Chief Justice. You have offered Questions on divers Statutes, all which mention two Accusers in Case of Indictments; you have deceived yourself, for the Laws of 25 Ed. III. and 5 Ed. VI. are repeal'd. It sufficeth now, if there be Proofs made either under Hand, or by Testimony of Witnesses, or by Oaths; it needs not the Subscription of the Party, so there be Hands of credible Men, to testify the Examination.

Raleigh. It may be an Error in me, and if those Laws be repeal'd, yet I hope the Equity of those Laws remains still; but if you affirm it, it must be a Law to Posterity; the Proof of the Common Law is by Witness and Jury; let Cobham be here, let him speak it: Call my Accuser before my Face, and I have done.

Attorney. Scientia sceleris est mera Ignorantia: You have read the Letter of the Law, but understand it not. Here was your Anchor-hold, and your Rendezvous; you trust to Cobham; either Cob-

ham must accuse you, or not accuse you; if he did, then it would not hurt you, because he is but one Witness; if he did not, then you are safe.

Raleigh. If ever I read a Word of the Law, or Statute before I was Prisoner in the Tower, God confound me.

Attorney. Now I come to prove the Circumstances of the Accusation to be true. Cobham confessed he had a Passport to travel, hereby intending to present Overtures to the Arch-duke, and from thence to go to Spain, and there to have Conference with the King for Money: You say, he promised to come Home by Jersey, to make merry with you and your Wife.

Raleigh. I said, in his Return from France, not Spain.

Attorney. Further, in his Examination, he saith, Nothing could be set down for the Distribution of the Money to the Discontented, without Conference with Raleigh. You said, It should have been for Procurement of Peace, but it was for raising Rebellion. Further, Cobham saith, He would never have entred into these Courses, but by your Instigation, and that you would never let him alone. Your Scholar was not apt enough to tell us all the Plots; that is enough for you to do, that are his Master: You intended to trust Sir Arthur Savage, whom I take to be an honest and true Gentleman, but not Sir Arthur Gorge.

Raleigh. All this is but one Accusation of Cobham's, I hear no other thing; to which Accusation he never subscribed, nor avouched it. I beseech you, my Lords, let Cobham be sent for, charge him on his Soul, on his Allegiance to the King; if he affirm it, I am guilty.

Lord Cecil. It is the Accusation of my Lord Cobham, it is the Evidence against you; must it not be of Force without his Subscription? I desire to be resolved by the Judges, Whether by the Law it is not a forcible Argument of Evidence.

The Judges. My Lord, it is.

Raleigh. The King, at his Coronation, is sworn In omnibus Judiciis suis Æquitatem, non Rigorem Legis observare: By the Rigour and Cruelty of the Law, it may be a forcible Evidence.

Lord Chief Justice. That is not the Rigour of the Law, but the Justice of the Law; else when a Man hath made a plain Accusation, by Practice, he might be brought to retract it again.

Raleigh. Oh my Lord! you may use Equity.

Lord Chief Justice. That is from the King; you are to have Justice from us.

Anderson. The Law is, if the Matter be proved to the Jury, they must find you guilty; for Cobham's Accusation is not only against you, there are other things sufficient.

Lord Cecil. Now that Sir Walter Raleigh is satisfied, that Cobham's Subscription is not necessary; I pray you Mr. Attorney go on.

Raleigh. Good Mr. Attorney be patient, and give me Leave.

Lord Cecil. An unnecessary Patience is a Hindrance; let him go on with his Proofs, and then retel them.

Raleigh. I would answer particularly.

Lord Cecil. If you would have a Table, and Pen and Ink, you shall.

Then Paper and Ink was given him.

Here the Clerk of the Crown read the Letter which the Lord Cobham did write in July, which was to the Effect of his former Examination, further saying, I have disclosed all; to accuse any falsely, were to burthen my own Conscience.

Attorney.

Attorney. Read Copley's Confession the 8th of June, he saith, He was offered 1000 Crowns to be in this Action.

Here Watson's Additions were read.

The great Mass of Money from the Count was impossible, &c.

Brook's Confession read.

There have Letters passed, saith he, between Cobham and Aremberg, for a great Sum of Money, to assist a second Action, for the surprizing of his Majesty.

Attorney. It is not possible it was of Passion; for it was in Talk before three Men being severally examined, who agreed in the Sum to be bestowed on dissaffected Persons. That Grey should have 12000 Crowns, and Raleigh should have 8000, or 10000 Crowns.

Cobham's Examination, July 18.

If the Money might be procured (saith he) then a Man may give Pensions. Being asked, if a Pension should not be given to his Brother Brook, he denied it not.

Lawrency's Examination.

Within five Days after Aremberg arrived, Cobham resorted unto him. That Night that Cobham went to Aremberg with Lawrency, Raleigh supped with him.

Attorney. Raleigh must have his Part of the Money, therefore now he is a Traytor. The Crown shall never stand one Year on the Head of the King (my Master) if a Traytor may not be condemned by Circumstances. For if A tells B, and B tells C, and C D, &c. you shall never prove Treason by two Witnesses.

Raleigh's Examination was read.

“ He confesseth Cobham offered him 8000 Crowns, which he was to have for the Furtherance of the Peace, between England and Spain; and that he should have it within three Days. To which, he said, he gave this Answer, When I see the Money, I will tell you more; for I had thought it had been one of his ordinary idle Conceits, and therefore made no Account thereof.

Raleigh. The Attorney hath made a long Narration of Copley, and the Priests, which concerns me nothing; neither know I how Cobham was altered. For he told me, If I would agree to further the Peace, he would get me 8000 Crowns. I asked him, Who shall have the rest of the Money? He said, I will offer such a Nobleman (who was not named) some of the Money. I said, He will not be persuaded by you, and will extremely hate you for such a Motion. Let me be pinched to Death with hot Irons, if ever I knew there was any Intention to bestow the Money on discontented Persons. I had made a Discourse against the Peace, and would have printed it: if Cobham changed his mind, if the Priests, if Brook had any such Intent, what is that to me? They must answer for it. He offered me the Money before Aremberg came, that is difference of Time.

Serj. Philips. Raleigh confesseth the Matter, but avoideth it, by distinguishing of Times. You said, it was offered you before the coming of Aremberg; which is false. For you being examined whether you should have such Money of Cobham, or not: You said, Yea; and that you should have it within two or three Days. Nemo moriturus praesumitur mentiri.

Lord Henry Howard. Alledge me any Ground or Cause, wherefore you gave ear to my Lord Cobham for receiving Pensions, in Matters you had not to deal with?

Raleigh. Could I stop my Lord Cobham's Mouth?

Lord Cecil. Sir Walter Raleigh presseth, that my Lord Cobham should be brought Face to Face. If he asks things of Favour and Grace, they must come only from him that can give them. If we sit here as Commissioners, how shall we be satisfied, whether he ought to be brought, unless we hear the Judges speak?

Lord Chief Justice. This thing cannot be granted; for then a Number of Treasons should flourish. The Accuser may be drawn by Practice, whilst he is in Person.

Judge Gaudy. The Statute you speak of, concerning two Witnesses, in Case of Treason, is found to be inconvenient; therefore by another Law it was taken away.

Raleigh. The common Trial of England is by Jury and Witnesses.

Lord Chief Justice. No, by Examination: If three conspire a Treason, and they all confess it; here is never a Witness, yet they are condemned.

Judge Warburton. I marvel, Sir Walter, that you being of such Experience and Wit, should stand on this Point; for so, many Horse-stealers may escape, if they may not be condemned without Witnesses. If one should rush into the King's Privy-Chamber, whilst he is alone, and kill the King (which God forbid) and this Man be met coming with his Sword drawn all bloody; shall not he be condemned to Death? My Lord Cobham hath, perhaps, been laboured withal; and to save you, his old Friend, it may be that he will deny all that which he hath said.

Raleigh. I know not how you conceive the Law.

Lord Chief Justice. Nay, we do not conceive the Law, but we know the Law.

Raleigh. The Wisdom of the Law of God, is absolute and perfect, Hæc fac, & vives, &c. But now by the Wisdom of the State, the Wisdom of the Law is uncertain. Indeed where the Accuser is not to be had conveniently, I agree with you; but here my Accuser may, he is alive, and in the House. Susanna had been condemned, if Daniel had not cried out: Will you condemn an innocent Israelite, without Examination or Knowledge of the Truth? Remember it is absolutely the Commandment of God; if a false Witness rise up, you shall cause him to be brought before the Judges; if he be found false, he shall have the Punishment which the Accused should have had. It is very sure, for my Lord to accuse me is my certain Danger, and may be a means to excuse himself.

Lord Chief Justice. There must not such a Gap be opened for the Destruction of the King, as would be, if we should grant this. You plead hard for yourself, but the Laws plead as hard for the King. I did never hear that Course to be taken in a Case of Treason, as to write to one another, or speak to one another, during the Time of their Imprisonment. There hath been Intelligence between you, and what underhand Practices there may be, I know not. If the Circumstances agree not with the Evidence, we will not condemn you.

Raleigh. The King desires nothing but the Knowledge of the Truth, and would have no Advantage taken by Severity of the Law. If ever we had a gracious King, now we have! I hope, as he is, such are his Ministers. If there be but a Trial of five Marks at the Common Law, a Witness must be deposed. Good my Lords, let my Accuser come Face to Face, and be deposed.

Lord Chief Justice. You have no Law for it: God forbid any Man should accuse himself, upon his Oath.

Attorney. The Law presumes, a Man will not accuse himself to accuse another. You are an odious Man: For Cobham thinks his Cause the worse, that you are in it. Now you shall hear of some Stirs to be raised in Scotland.

Part of Copley's Examination.

" Also Watson told me, that a special Person told him that Aremberg offered to him a thousand Crowns to be in that Action; and that Brook said, the Stirs in Scotland came out of Raleigh's Head.

Raleigh. Brook hath been taught his Lesson.

Lord H. Howard. This Examination was taken before me; Did I teach him his Lesson?

Raleigh. I protest before God, I meant it not by any Privy-Counsellor; but, because Money is scant, he will juggle on both Sides.

Raleigh's Examination.

" The way to invade England, were to begin with Stirs in Scotland.

Raleigh. I think so still: I have spoken it to divers of the Lords of the Council, by way of Discourse and Opinion.

Attorney. Now let us come to those Words of Destroying the King and his Cubs.

Raleigh. O barbarous! if they, like unnatural Villains, should use those Words, shall I be charged with them? I will not hear it; I was never false to the Crown of England. I have spent 40000 Crowns of mine own, against the Spanish Faction, for the Good of my Country. Do you bring the Words of these hellish Spiders, Clark, Watson, and others, against me?

Attorney. Thou hast a Spanish-Heart, and thyself art a Spider of Hell; for thou confessest the King to be a most sweet and gracious Prince, and yet hast conspired against him.

Watson's Examination read.

" He said, that George Brook told him twice, that his Brother, the Lord Cobham, said to him, That you are but on the Bye, but Raleigh and I are on the Main.

Brook's Examination read.

" Being ask'd what was meant by this Jargon the Bye and the Main, he said, That the Lord Cobham told him, that Grey and others, were in the Bye, he and Raleigh were on the Main. Being ask'd what Exposition his Brother made of these Words, he said, he is loth to repeat it. And after faith, by the Main, was meant, the taking away of the King and his Issue. And thinks on his Conscience, it was infused into his Brother's Head by Raleigh.

Cobham's Examination read.

Being ask'd, if ever he had said, It will never be well in England, till the King and his Cubs were taken away. He said, He had answered before, and that he would answer no more to that Point.

Raleigh. I am not named in all this: There is a Law of two Sorts of Accusers, one of his own Knowledge, another by Hear-say.

Earl of Suffolk. See the Case of Arnold.

Lord Chief Justice. It is the Case of Sir William Thomas, and Sir Nicholas Arnold.

Raleigh. If this may be, you will have any Man's Life in a Week.

Attorney. Raleigh faith, That Cobham was in a Passion when he said so. Would he tell his Brother any thing of Malice against Raleigh, whom he loved as his Life?

Raleigh. Brook never loved me; until his Brother had accused me, he said nothing.

Lord Cecil. We have heard nothing that might lead us to think, that Brook accused you, he was only in the Surprising Treason; for by accusing you, he should accuse his Brother.

Raleigh. He doth not care much for that.

Lord Cecil. I must judge the best. The Accusation of his Brother was not voluntary; he pardoned every thing, as much as he could, to save his Brother.

Cobham's Examination read.

" He faith, he had a Book written against the Title of the King, which he had of Raleigh, and that he gave it to his Brother: Raleigh said, it was foolishly written.

Attorney. After the King came within twelve Miles of London, Cobham never came to see him, and intended to travel without seeing the Queen, and the Prince. Now in this Discontentment, you gave him the Book, and he gave it to his Brother.

Raleigh. I never gave it him, he took it off my Table. For I well remember, a little before that time, I received a Challenge from Sir Amias Preston, and for that I did intend to answer it, I resolved to leave my Estate settled, therefore laid out all my loose Papers, amongst which was this Book.

Lord Howard. Where had you this Book?

Raleigh. In the old Lord-Treasurer's Study, after his Death.

Lord Cecil. Did you ever shew or make known the Book to me?

Raleigh. No, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. Was it one of the Books which was left to me or my Brother?

Raleigh. I took it out of the Study in my Lord Treasurer's House in the Strand.

Lord Cecil. After my Father's decease, Sir Walter Raleigh desired to search for some Cosmographical Descriptions of the Indies, which he thought were in his Study, and were not to be had in print; which I granted, and would have trusted Sir Walter Raleigh as soon as any Man; tho' since, for some Infirmities, the Bands of my Affection to him have been broken; and yet, reserving my Duty to the King my Master, which I can by no means dispense with, by God, I love him, and have a great Conflict within myself: But I must needs say, Sir Walter used me a little unkindly, to take the Book away without my Knowledge; nevertheless I need make no Apology in Behalf of my Father, considering how useful and necessary it is for Privy-Counsellors, and those in his Place, to intercept and keep such kind of Writings; for whosoever should then search his Study, may in all likelihood find all the notorious Libels that were writ against the late Queen; and whosoever should rumage my Study, or at least my Cabinet, may find several against the King, our sovereign Lord, since his Accession to the Throne.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. This Book was in Manuscript, and the late Lord Treasurer had wrote in the Beginning of it with his own Hands these Words, This is the Book of Robert Snagg. And I do own, as my Lord Cecil has said, that I believe they may also find in my House, almost all the Libels, that have been writ against the late Queen.

Attorney. You were no Privy-Counsellor, and I hope never shall be.

Lord Cecil. He was not a sworn Counsellor of State, but he has been called to Consultations.

Raleigh. I think it a very severe Interpretation of the Law, to bring me within Compass of Treason for this Book, writ so long ago, of which nobody had read any more than the Heads of the Chapters, and which was burnt by Brook without my Privy; admitting I had delivered the same to my Lord Cobham, without allowing or approving, but discommending it, according to Cobham's first Accusation. And put the Case I should come to my Lord Cecil, as I have often done, and find a Stranger with him, with a Packet of Libels, and my Lord should let me have one or two of them to peruse, This I hope is no Treason.

Attorney. I observe there was Intelligence between you and Cobham in the Tower; for after he said, It was against the King's Title, he denied it again.

Sir William Wade. First my Lord Cobham confesseth it, and after he had subscribed it, he revoked it again: To me he always said, That the Drift of it was against the King's Title.

Raleigh. I protest before God, and all his Works, I gave him not the Book.

Nota. Sir Robert Wroth speaketh, or whispereth something secretly.

Attorney. My Lords, I must complain of Sir Robert Wroth; he says, this Evidence is not material.

Sir Robert Wroth. I never spake the Words.

Attorney. Let Mr. Serjeant Philips testify, whether he heard them.

Lord Cecil. I will give my Word for Sir Robert Wroth.

Sir Robert Wroth. I will speak as truly as you, Mr. Attorney, for, by God, I never spake it.

Lord Chief Justice. Wherefore should this Book be burnt?

Raleigh. I burned it not.

Serj. Philips. You presented your Friend with it, when he was discontented. If it had been before the Queen's Death, it had been a less matter; but you gave it him presently when he came from the King, which was the time of his Discontentment.

Raleigh. Here is a Book supposed to be Treasonable; I never read it, commended it, or deliver'd it, nor urged it.

Attorney. This is cunning.

Raleigh. Every thing that doth make for me is cunning, and every thing that maketh against me is probable.

Attorney. Lord Cobham saith, that Kemish came to him with a Letter torn, and did with him not to be dismay'd, for one Witness could not hurt him.

Raleigh. This poor Man hath been close Prisoner these eighteen Weeks; he was offered the Rack to make him confess. I never sent any such Message by him; I only writ to him, to tell him what I had done with Mr. Attorney; having of his, at that time, a great Pearl, and a Diamond.

Lord H. Howard. No Circumstance moveth me more, than this, Kemish was never on the Rack; the King gave Charge, that no Rigour should be used.

Commissioners. We protest before God, there was no such Matter intended, to our Knowledges.

Raleigh. Was not the Keeper of the Rack sent for, and he threatned with it?

Sir William Wade. When Mr. Solicitor and myself examined Kemish, we told him he deserved the Rack, but did not threaten him with it.

Commissioners. It was more than we knew.

Cobham's Examination read.

“ He said, Kemish brought him a Letter from “ Raleigh, and that Part which was concerning the “ Lords of the Council, was rent out; that he was “ examined, and cleared him of all; and that the “ Lord H. Howard said, because he was discontent, he was fit to be in the Action. And further, that Kemish said to him from Raleigh, that he should be of good Comfort, for one Witness could not condemn a Man for Treason.

Lord Cecil. Cobham was asked whether and when he heard from you; he said, every Day.

Raleigh. Kemish added more, I never bad him speak these Words.

Nota. Mr. Attorney here offered to interrupt him.

Lord Cecil. It is his last Discourse. Give him leave Mr. Attorney.

Raleigh. I am accused concerning Arabella, concerning Money out of Spain. My Lord Chief Justice saith, a Man may be condemned with one Witness, yea without any Witness. Cobham is guilty of many things, Conscientia mille Testes. He hath accused himself, what can he hope for but Mercy? My Lords, vouchsafe me this Grace. Let him be brought, being alive, and in the House; let him avouch any of these things, I will confess the whole Indictment, and renounce the King's Mercy.

Lord Cecil. Here hath been a touch of the Lady Arabella Stuart, a near Kinswoman of the King's. Let us not scandal the Innocent by Confusion of Speech: She is as innocent of all these Things as I, or any Man here; only she received a Letter from Cobham, to prepare her; which she laugh'd at, and immediately sent it to the King. So far was she from Discontentment, that she laugh'd him to scorn. But you see how far the Count of Aremberg did consent.

The Lord Admiral (Nottingham) being by in a Standing, with the Lady Arabella, spake to the Court.

The Lady doth here protest upon her Salvation, that she never dealt in any of these things, and so she willed me to tell the Court.

Lord Cecil. The Lord Cobham wrote to my Lady Arabella, to know if he might come to speak with her, and gave her to understand, that there were some about the King, that laboured to disgrace her; she doubted it was but a Trick. But Brook saith, his Brother moved him to procure Arabella to write Letters to the King of Spain: But he saith, he never did.

Raleigh. The Lord Cobham hath accused me, you see in what manner he hath forsworn it. Were it not for his Accusation, all this were nothing. Let him be asked, if I knew of the Letter which

Lawrency brought to him from Aremberg. Let me speak for my Life, it can be no hurt for him to be brought; he dares not accuse me. If you grant me not this Favour, I am strangely used. Campion was not denied to have his Accusers Face to Face.

Lord Chief Justice. Since he must needs have Justice, the acquitting of his old Friend may move him to speak otherwise than the Truth.

Raleigh. If I had been the Infuser of all these Treasons into him. You Gentlemen of the Jury, mark this: He said, I have been the Cause of all his Miseries, and the Destruction of his House; and that all Evil hath happened unto him, by my wicked Counsel; if this be true, whom hath he Cause to accuse, and be revenged on, but on me? And I know him to be as revengeful, as any Man on Earth.

Attorney. He is a Party, and may not come, the Law is against it.

Raleigh. It is a Toy to tell me of Law. I defy such Law, I stand on the Fact.

Lord Cecil. I am afraid my often speaking (who am inferior to my Lords here present) will make the World think, I delight to hear myself talk. My Affection to you, Sir Walter Raleigh, was not extinguished, but flaked, in regard of your Deserts. You know the Law of the Realm (to the which your Mind doth not contest) that my Lord Cobham cannot be brought.

Raleigh. He may be, my Lord.

Lord Cecil. But dare you challenge it?

Raleigh. No.

Lord Cecil. You say, that my Lord Cobham, your main Accuser, must come to accuse you. You say, he hath retracted: I say many Particulars are not retracted. What the Validity of all this is, is merely left to the Jury. Let me ask you this: If my Lord Cobham will say, you were the only Instigator of him to proceed in the Treasons, dare you put yourself on this?

Raleigh. If he will speak it before God and the King, that ever I knew of Arabella's Matter, or the Money out of Spain, or of the Surprising Treason; I put myself on it, God's Will and the King's be done with me.

Lord H. Howard. How if he speak things equivalent to what you have said?

Raleigh. Yes, in a main Point.

Lord Cecil. If he say, you have been the Instigator of him to deal with the Spanish King, had not the Council cause to draw you hither?

Raleigh. I put myself on it.

Lord Cecil. Then, Sir Walter Raleigh, call upon God, and prepare yourself; for I do verily believe, my Lords will prove this. Excepting your Faults (I call them no worse) by God, I am your Friend. The Heat and Passion in you, and the Attorney's Zeal in the King's Service, makes me speak this.

Raleigh. Whosoever is the Workman, it is reason he should give Account of his Work to the Workmaster. But let it be proved, that he acquainted me with any of his Conferences with Aremberg: He would surely have given me some Account.

Lord Cecil. That follows not. If I set you on Work, and you give me no Account, am I therefore innocent?

Attorney. For the Lady Arabella I said, she was never acquainted with the Matter. Now that Raleigh had Conference in all these Treasons, it is manifest; the Jury hath heard the Matter. There is one Dyer, a Pilot, that being in Lisbon, met with a Portugal Gentleman, who asked him if the King of England was crowned yet? To whom he answered, I think not yet, but he shall be shortly. Nay, saith the Portugal Gentleman, that shall he never be, for his Throat will be cut by Don Raleigh and Don Cobham, before he be crowned.

Dyer was called and sworn, and delivered this Evidence.

Dyer. I came to a Merchant's House in Lisbon, to see a Boy that I had there; there came in a Gentleman into the House, and enquiring what Countryman I was, I said an Englishman: Whereupon he asked me, if the King was crowned? And I answered, that I hoped he should be so shortly. Nay, saith he, he shall never be crowned, for Don Raleigh and Don Cobham will cut his Throat ere that Day come.

Raleigh. What infer you upon this?

Attorney. That your Treason hath Wings.

Raleigh. If Cobham did practise with Aremberg, how could it not but be known in Spain? Why did they name the Duke of Buckingham with Jack Straw's Treason, and the Duke of York with Jack Cade, but that it was to countenance his Treason?

Consider, you Gentlemen of the Jury, there is no Cause so doubtful, which the King's Council cannot make good against the Law. Consider my Disability, and their Ability: They prove nothing against me, only they bring the Accusation of my Lord Cobham, which he hath lamented and repented as heartily, as if it had been for a horrible Murder. For he knew, that all this Sorrow which should come to me, is by his means. Presumptions must proceed from precedent or subsequent Facts. I have spent 40000 Crowns against the Spaniard. I had not purchased forty Pounds a Year. If I had died in Guiana, I had not left 300 Marks a Year to my Wife and Son. I that have always condemned the Spanish Faction, methinks it is a strange Thing, that now I should affect it. Remember what St. Austin says, Sic judicate tanquam ab alio mox judicandi; unus judex, unum tribunal. If you would be contented, on Presumptions, to be delivered up to be slaughtered, to have your Wives and Children turned into the Streets to beg their Bread; if you would be contented to be so judged, judge so of me.

Serj. Philips. I hope to make this so clear, as that the Wit of Man shall have no Colour to answer it. The Matter is Treason in the highest Degree, the End to deprive the King of his Crown. The particular Treasons are these: First, To raise up Rebellion; and, to effect that, to procure Money; to raise up Tumults in Scotland, by divulging a treasonable Book against the King's Right to the Crown; the Purpose, to take the Life of his Majesty and his Issue. My Lord Cobham confesseth Sir Walter Raleigh to be guilty of all these Treasons. The Question is, Whether he be guilty as joining with him, or instigating of him? The Course to prove this, was by my Lord Cobham's Accusation. If that be true, he is guilty; if not, he is clear. So, whether Cobham say true, or Raleigh? That is the Question. Raleigh hath no Answer, but the Shadow of as much Wit, as the Wit of Man can devise. He useth his bare Denial; the Denial of a Defendant must not move the Jury. In the Star-chamber, or in the Chancery, for matter of Title, if the Defendant be called in Question, his Denial on his Oath is no Evidence to the Court to clear him, he doth it in propria Causa. Therefore much less in Matters of Treason. Cobham's Testification against him before then, and since, hath been largely discouraged.

Raleigh.

Raleigh. If Truth be constant, and Constancy be in Truth, Why hath he forsworn that, that he hath said? You have not proved any one Thing by direct Proofs, but all by Circumstances.

Attorney. Have you done? The King must have the last.

Raleigh. Nay, Mr. Attorney, he which speaketh for his Life, must speak last. False Repetitions and Mistakings must not mar my Cause. You should speak secundum allegata & probata. I appeal to God and the King, in this Point, Whether Cobham's Accusation be sufficient to condemn me.

Attorney. The King's Safety, and your Clearing, cannot agree. I protest, before God, I never knew a clearer Treason.

Raleigh. I never had Intelligence with Cobham since I came to the Tower.

Attorney. Go too, I will lay thee upon thy Back, for the confidentest Traytor that ever came at a Bar. Why should you take 8000 Crowns for a Peace?

Lord Cecil. Be not so impatient, good Mr. Attorney, give him leave to speak.

Attorney. If I may not be patiently heard, you will encourage Traytors, and discourage us. I am the King's sworn Servant, and must speak; if he be guilty, he is a Traytor; if not, deliver him.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney sat down and would speak no more, until the Commissioners urged and intreated him: After much ado he went on, and made a long Repetition of all the Evidence, for the Direction of the Jury; and at the repeating of some things, Sir Walter Raleigh interrupted him, and said, He did him Wrong.

Attorney. Thou art the most vile and execrable Traytor that ever lived.

Raleigh. You speak indiscreetly, barbarously and uncivilly.

Attorney. I want Words sufficient to express thy viperous Treasons.

Raleigh. I think you want Words indeed, for you have spoken one Thing half a dozen times.

Attorney. Thou art an odious Fellow, thy Name is hateful to all the Realm of England for thy Pride.

Raleigh. It will go near to prove a measuring Cast between you and me, Mr. Attorney.

Attorney. Well, I will now make it appear to the World, that there never lived a viler Viper upon the Face of the Earth than thou; and therewithal drew a Letter out of his Pocket, saying further, My Lords, you shall see, this is an Agent, that hath writ a Treatise against the Spaniard, and hath ever so detested him; this is he, that hath spent so much Money against him in Service; and yet you shall all see, whether his Heart be not wholly Spanish. The Lord Cobham, who, of his own Nature was a good and honourable Gentleman, till overtaken by this Wretch, now finding his Conscience heavily burthened with some Courses, which the Subtilty of this Traytor had drawn him into, my Lords, he could not be at rest with himself, nor quiet in his Thoughts, until he was eased of that heavy Weight; out of which Passion of his Mind, and Discharge of his Duty to his Prince, and his Conscience to God, taking it upon his Salvation, that he wrote nothing but the Truth, with his own Hands he wrote this Letter. Now, Sir, you shall see whether you had Intelligence with Cobham, within four Days before he came to the Tower. If he be wholly Spanish, that desired a Pension of 1500 Pounds a Year from Spain, that Spain by him might have Intelligence, then Raleigh is a Traytor. He hath taken an Apple, and pinned a Letter unto it, and threw it into my Lord Cobham's Window; the Contents whereof were this; It is doubtful whether we shall be proceeded with or no, perhaps you shall not be tried. This was to get a Retraction. Oh! it was Adam's Apple, whereby the Devil did deceive him. Further he wrote thus, Do not as my Lord of Essex did; take heed of a Preacher; for by his Persuasion he confessed, and made himself guilty. I doubt not, but this Day, God shall have as great a Conquest by this Traytor, and the Son of God shall be as much glorified, as when it was said, Vicisti Galilæe; you know my meaning. What tho' Cobham retracted, yet he could not rest nor sleep, until he had confirmed it again. If this be not enough to prove him a Traytor, the King my Master shall not live three Years to an end.

Nota. Here Mr. Attorney produced the Lord Cobham's Letter (writ to the Commissioners the Night before Raleigh's Trial, viz. Nov. 16.) and as he read it, inserted some Speeches.

*I have thought it fit, to set down this to my Lords, wherein I profess on my Soul, to write nothing but the Truth. I am come now near to the Period of my Time, therefore I confess the Truth before God, and his Angels. Raleigh, four Days before I came to the Tower, caused an Apple (Eve's Apple) to be thrown in at my Chamber-window; the Effect of it was to intreat me to right the Wrong that I had done him, in saying, That I should have come home by Jersey; which under my Hand to him, I have retracted. His first Letter I answered not, which was thrown in the same manner, wherein he prayed me to write him a Letter, which I did. He sent me Word, that the Judges were at Mr. Attorney's House, and that there was good Hope the Proceedings against us should be staid; he sent me another Time a little Tobacco. At Aremberg's coming, Raleigh dealt with me, to procure him a Pension of 1500 Pounds a Year, for which he promised that no Action should be against Spain, but he would give Knowledge before-hand. He told me the States had Audience with the King. (Ah, is not this a Spanish Heart in an English Body?) He hath been the original Cause of my Ruin; for I had no dealing with Aremberg, but by his Instigation. He hath been also the Cause of my Discontentment; he advised me, not to be overtaken with Preachers, as Essex was, and that the King would better allow of a constant Denial, than to accuse any.*

Attorney. O damnable Atheist! he hath learned some Text of Scripture, to serve his own Purpose, but falsely alledged. He counsels him, not to be counselled by Preachers, as Essex was: He died the Child of God, God honoured him at his Death; Thou wast by when he died, Et Lupus & turpes instant morientibus Ursæ. He died indeed for his Offence. The King himself spake these Words; He that shall say Essex died not for Treason, is punishable.

Raleigh. You have heard a strange Tale of a strange Man; now he thinks he hath Matter enough to destroy me; but the King, and all of you shall witness by our Deaths, which of us was the Ruin of the other. I bid a poor Fellow throw in the Letter at his Window, written to this Purpose, You know you have undone me, now write that Lines to justify me. In this I will [die, that he hath done me Wrong; Why did not he acquaint me with his Treasons, if I acquainted him with my Dispositions?

Attorney. But what say you now of the Letter, and the Pension of 1500 l. per Annum?

Raleigh. I say, that Cobham is a base dishonourable poor Soul.

Attorney. Is he base? I return it into thy Throat, on his behalf: But for thee, he had been a good Subject.

Lord Chief Justice. I perceive thou art not so clear a Man, as you have protested all this while; for you should have discovered these Matters to the King.

Nota. Here Raleigh pulled a Letter out of his Pocket, which the Lord Cobham had written to him (but a few Days before he wrote that above to the Lords) and desired my Lord Cecil to read it, because he only knew his Hand; the Effect of it was as followeth.

Cobham's Letter of Justification to Raleigh.

" Seeing my self so near my End, for the Dis" charge of my own Conscience, and freeing my " self from your Blood, which else will cry Ven" geance against me: I protest upon my Salvation,
" I never practised with Spain by your Procure" ment; God so comfort me in this my Afflic-" tion, as you are a true Subject for any thing that " I know. I will say, as Daniel, Purus sum à " sanguine hujus. So God have Mercy on my " Soul, as I know no Treason by you.

Raleigh. Now I wonder how many Souls this Man hath! He damns one in this Letter, and another in that.

Here was much ado; Mr. Attorney alledged, that his last Letter was politickly and cunningly urged from the Lord Cobham, and that the first was simply the Truth; and that lest it should seem doubtful, that the first Letter was drawn from my Lord Cobham by Promise of Mercy, or Hope of Favour, the Lord Chief Justice willed, that the Jury might herein be satisfied. Whereupon the Earl of Devonshire delivered, that the same was merely voluntary, and not extracted from the Lord Cobham, upon any Hopes or Promise of Pardon.

Nota. This was the last Evidence; whereupon a Marshal was sworn, to keep the Jury private. The Jury departed, and staid not a quarter of an Hour, but returned, and gave their Verdict Guilty.

Serj. Hele demanded Judgment against the Prisoner.

Clerk of the Crown. Sir Walter Raleigh, Thou hast been indicted, arraigned, and pleaded not guilty, for all these several Treasons; and for Trial thereof, hast put thy self upon thy Country; which Country are these, who have found thee Guilty. What canst thou say for thyself, why Judgment and Execution of Death, should not pass against thee?

Raleigh. My Lords, The Jury have found me Guilty. They must do as they are directed. I can say nothing, why Judgment should not proceed. You see whereof Cobham hath accused me. You remember his Protestations, that I was never Guilty. I desire the King should know of the Wrongs done unto me, since I came hither.

Lord Chief Justice. You have had no Wrong, Sir Walter.

Raleigh. Yes, of Mr. Attorney. I desire, my Lords, to remember three things to the King.

1. I was accused to be a Practiser for Spain: I never knew, that my Lord Cobham meant to go thither; I will ask no Mercy at the King's Hands, if he will affirm it. 2. I never knew of the Practice with Arabella. 3. I never knew of my Lord Cobham's Practice with Aremberg, nor of the surprising Treason.

Lord Chief Justice. In my Conscience I am persuaded, that Cobham hath accused you truly. You cannot deny, but that you were dealt with, to have a Pension to be a Spy for Spain; therefore you are not so true to the King, as you have protested yourself to be.

Raleigh. I submit myself to the King's Mercy; I know his Mercy is greater than my Offence. I recommend my Wife, and Son, of tender Years, unbrought up, to his Compassion.

Lord Chief Justice. I had thought I should never have seen this Day, to have stood in this Place, to give Sentence of Death against you; because I thought it impossible, that one of so great Parts should have fallen so grievously. God hath bestowed on you many Benefits. You had been a Man fit, and able, to have served the King in good Place. You had brought yourself into a good State of Living: If you had entered into a good Consideration of your Estate, and not suffered your own Wit to have entrapped yourself, you might have lived in good Comfort. It is best for Man not to seek to climb too high, lest he fall; nor yet to creep too low, lest he be trodden on. It was the Posie of the wisest and greatest Counsellor of his Time, in England, In medio spatio mediocria firma locantur. You might have lived well with 3000 l. a Year, for so I have heard your Revenues to be. I know nothing might move you to be discontented; but, if you had been down, you know Fortune's Wheel, when it is turned about, riseth again. I never heard, that the King took away any thing from you, but the Captainship of the Guard, which he did with good Reasons, to have one of his own Knowledge, whom he might trust in that Place. You have been taken for a wise Man, and so have shewed Wit enough this Day. Again, for Monopolies for Wine, &c. If the King had said, It is a Matter that offends my People, should I burthen them for your particular good? I think, you could not well take it hardly, that his Subjects were eased, tho' by your private Hindrance. Two Vices have lodged chiefly in you; one is an eager Ambition; the other corrupt Covetousness. Ambition, in desiring to be advanced to equal Grace and Favour, as you have been before-time; that Grace you had then, you got not in a Day or Year. For your Covetousness, I am sorry to hear that a Gentleman of your Wealth should become a base Spy for the Enemy, which is the vilest of all other; wherein, on my Conscience, Cobham hath said true: By it you would have increased your Living 1500 l. a Year. This Covetousness is like a Canker, that eats the Iron-place where it lives. Your Case being thus, let it not grieve you, if I speak a little out of Zeal, and Love, to your Good. You have been taxed by the World, with the Defence of most heathenish, and blasphemous Opinions, which I list not to repeat, because Christian Ears cannot endure to hear them, nor the Authors and Maintainers of them be suffered to live in any Christian Common-wealth. You know what Men said of Harpool. You shall do well before you go out of the World, to give Satisfaction therein, and not to die with these Imputations on you. Let not any Devil persuade you to think, there is no Eternity in Heaven; if you think thus, you shall find Eternity in Hell-fire. In the first Accusation of my Lord Cobham, I observed his manner of speaking: I protest before the living

h h h h

Living God, I am persuaded he spoke nothing but the Truth. You wrote, that he should not in any case confess any thing to a Preacher, telling him an Example of my Lord of Essex, that noble Earl that is gone; who, if he had not been carried away with others, had lived in Honour to this Day among us. He confessed his Offences, and obtained Mercy of the Lord; for I am verily persuaded in my Heart, he died a worthy Servant of God. Your Conceit of not confessing any thing, is very inhuman and wicked. In this World is the Time of confessing, that we may be absolved at the Day of Judgment. You have shewed a fearful Sign of denying God, in advising a Man not to confess. It now comes in my mind, why you may not have your Accuser Face to Face; for such a one is easily brought to retract, when he seeth there is no Hope of his own Life. It is dangerous that any Traytors should have any Access one to another, or Conference; when they see themselves must die, they will think it best to see their Fellow live, that he may commit the like Treason again, and so in some sort seek Revenge.

Now it resteth to pronounce the Judgment, which I wish you had not been this Day to have received of me: For, if the Fear of God in you had been answerable to your other great Parts, you might have lived to have been a singular good Subject. I never saw the like Trial, and I hope, I shall never see the like again.

The J U D G M E N T.

But since you have been found Guilty of these horrible Treasons, the Judgment of the Court is, that you shall be had from hence to the Place whence you came, there to remain until the Day of Execution; and from thence you shall be drawn upon a Hurdle through the open Streets, to the Place of Execution, there to be hanged and cut down alive, and your Body shall be opened, your Heart and Bowels plucked out, and your Privy-Members cut off and thrown into the Fire, before your Eyes; then your Head to be stricken off from your Body, which shall be divided into four Quarters, to be disposed of at the King's Pleasure: And God have Mercy upon your Soul.

OW unfit, and how unworthy a choice I have made of my self, to undertake a work of this mixture; mine own reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved me. For had it been begotten then with my first dawn of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it self to my younger years; and before any wound received, either from fortune or time: I might yet well have doubted, that the darkness of age and death would have covered over both it and me, long before the performance. For, beginning with the creation, I have proceeded with the History of the World; and lastly purposed (some few fallies excepted) to confine my discourse, within this our renowned island of Great Britain. I confess that it had better sorted with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other travels; to have set together (as I could) the unjointed and scattered frame of our English affairs, than of the universal: in whom had there been no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough; the day of a tempestuous life, drawn on to the very evening ere I began. But those inmost, and soul-piercing wounds, which are ever aking while uncured: with the desire to satisfy those friends, which I have tried by the fire of adversity; the former enforcing, the latter perswading; have caused me to make my thoughts legible, and my self the subject of every opinion, wise or weak.

To the world I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither have others that were (fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For, prosperity and adversity have evermore tied and untied vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs do always bark at those they know not; and that it is in their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so is it with the inconsiderate multitude. Who, wanting that virtue which we call honesty in all men, and that especial gift of God which we call charity in christian men; condemn, without hearing; and wound, without offence given; led thereunto by uncertain report only; <sup>a</sup> which his majesty truly acknowledgeth for the author of all lyes. <sup>b</sup> Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou have inquired the matter: understand first, and then reform righteously. Rumor, res sine teste, sine judice, maligna, fallax; rumour is without witness, without judge, malicious and deccivable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gave S. Augustine argument to affirm, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the evil. <sup>c</sup> And hercin no man hath given a better rule, than this of Seneca; Conscientiæ satisfacimus: nihil in famam laboremus; sequatur

vel mala, dum bene merearis. Let us satisfy our own consciences, and not trouble our selves with fame: be it never so ill, it is to be despised so we deserve well.

For my self, if I have in any thing served my country, and prized it before my private: the general acceptation can yield me no other profit at this time, than doth a fair sun-shine day to a sea-man after shipwreck; and the contrary, no other harm than an outrageous tempest after the port attained. I know that I lost the love of many, for my fidelity towards her, whom I must still honour in the dust; though further than the defence of her excellent person I never persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what device they did it: he that is the supreme judge of all the world, hath taken the account; so as for this kind of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parta, delectat.

As for other men; if there be any that have made themselves fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither envy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine own mishap in that kind; but content my self to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars.

To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: seeing it is not truth, but opinion, that can travel the world without a pass-port. For were it otherwise; and were there not as many internal forms of the mind, as there are external figures of men; there were then some possibility, to persuade by the mouth of one advocate, even equity alone.

But such is the multiplying and extensive virtue of dead earth, and of that breath-giving life which God hath cast upon slime and dust: as that among those that were, of whom we read and hear, and among those that are, whom we see and converse with; every one hath received a several picture of face, and every one a diverse picture of mind: every one a form apart, every one a fancy and cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein nature so much triumpheth, as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh, that there is found so great diversity of opinions; so strong a contrariety of inclinations; so many natural and unnatural; wise, foolish; manly, and childish affections and passions in mortal men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable creatures, that makes the difference, of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the formal and internal.

And though it hath pleased God, to reserve the art of reading men's thoughts to himself: yet, as the fruit tells the name of the tree; so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) give us whereof to guess at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to express the one by the other, very near the life; did not craft in many, fear in the most, and the world's love in all, teach every capacity, according to the compass it hath, to qualify and mask over their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam suam residunt, quibus veritas non subest. No Man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behaviour: the things that are forced for pretences, having no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himself, but that his heart may be sometimes seen at his tongue's end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable creatures, if we direct our selves to the multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus, The common people are evil judges of honest things, and whose wisdom (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised; if to the better sort; every understanding hath a peculiar judgment, by which it both censureth other men, and valueth it self. And therefore unto me it will not seem strange, though I find these my worthless papers torn with rats: seeing the slothful censurers of all ages have not spared to tax the reverend fathers of the church, with ambition; the severest severest men to themselves, with hypocrisy; the greatest lovers of justice, with popularity; and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vain-glory. <sup>a</sup> But of these natures, which lie in wait to find fault, and to turn good into evil, seeing <sup>b</sup> Solomon complained long since: and that the very age of the world renders it every day after other more malicious; I must leave the professors to their easy ways of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this preface, following the common and approved custom of those who have left the memories of time past to after-ages; to give, as near as I can, the same right to history which they have done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other men's words; I will not trouble the reader with the repetition. True it is, that among many other benefits, for which it hath been honoured; in this one it triumpheth over all human knowledge, that it hath given us life in our understanding, since the world it self had life and beginning, even to this day: yea it hath triumphed over time, which, besides it, nothing but eternity hath triumphed over: for it hath carried our knowledge over the vast and devouring space of so many thousands of years, and given so fair and piercing eyes to our mind; that we plainly behold living now, as if we had lived then, that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise work (saith Hermes) of a great God, as it was then, when but new to it self. By it I say it is, that we live in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was governed: how it was covered with waters, and again re-peopled: how kings and kingdoms have flourished and fallen; and for what virtue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe unto history, that it hath made us acquainted with our dead ancestors; and, out of the depth and darkness of the earth, delivered us their memory and fame. In a word, we may gather out of history a policy no less wise than eternal; by the comparison and application of other men's fore-passed miseries, with our own like errors and ill deservings.

But it is neither of examples the most lively instruction, nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified minds; as to make us remember, that the infinite eye and wisdom of God doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make us remember, That the justice of God doth require none other accuser, than our own consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacify the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, cover from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen wisdom confess, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) having in his life committed wickedness, think he can hide it from the everlasting gods, he thinks not well.

To repeat God's judgments in particular, upon those of all degrees, which have played with his mercies; would require a volume apart: for the sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on private men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written only in the memories of those that lived with them: so as they who succeed, and have not seen the fall of others, do not fear their own faults. God's judgments upon the greater and greatest, have been left to posterity; first, by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath guided; and secondly, by their virtue, who have gathered the acts and ends of men, mighty and remarkable in the world. Now to point far off, and to speak of the conversion of angels into devils for ambition: or of the greatest and most glorious kings, who have gnawn the grass of the earth with beasts, for pride and ingratitude towards God: or of that wise working of Pharaoh, when he slew the infants of Israel, ere they had recovered their cradles: or of the policy of Jezebel, in covering the murder of Naboth by a trial of the Elders, according to the law; with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopeless proof, that far-off examples would not be left to the same far-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not observed, what labour, practice, peril, bloodshed, and cruelty, the kings and princes of the world have undergone, exercised, taken on them, and committed; to make themselves and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, and the rest, no fruit, flower, grass, nor leaf, springing upon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No; their very roots and ruins do hardly remain. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum evertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient; All that the hand of man can make, is either overturn'd by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of those ruins, are diversly given by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All kingdoms and states have fallen (say the politicians) by outward and foreign force, or by inward negligence and dissension, or by a third cause arising from both. Others observe, That the greatest have sunk down under their own weight; of which Livy hath a touch: Eo crevit, ut magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the divine providence (which Cratippus objected to Pompey) hath set down the date and period of every estate, before their first foundation and erection. But hereof I will give my self a day over to resolve.

For seeing the first books of the following story, have undertaken the discourse of the first kings and kingdoms: and that it is impossible for the short life of a preface, to travel after and overtake far-off antiquity, and to judge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own kings, and their neighbour princes: who having beheld, both in divine and human letters, the success of infidelity, injustice, and cruelty; have (notwithstanding) planted after the same pattern.

True it is, that the judgments of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred up alike with examples of like nature: But every one is touched most, with that which most nearly seemeth to touch his own private; or otherwise best suiteth with his apprehension. but the judgments of God are for ever unchangeable; neither is he wearied by the long process of time, and won to give his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom, if it be not great, yet is true and well grounded; will be able to discern the bitter fruits of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed far from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no less appear by evident proof, than by asseveration, That ill doing hath always been attended with ill success; I will here, by way of preface, run over some examples, which the work ensuing hath not reached.

Among our kings of the Norman race, we have no sooner passed over the violence of the Norman conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of God's justice, upon the children of Henry the

the first. For that king, when both by force, craft, and cruelty, he had dispossest, over-reach'd, and lastly made blind and destroyed his elder brother Robert duke of Normandy, to make his own sons lords of this land : God cast them all, male and female, nephews and nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottom of the sea, with above a hundred and fifty others that attended them ; whereof a great many were noble, and of the king dearly beloved.

To pass over the rest, till we come to Edward the second ; it is certain, that after the murder of that king, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did again break out ; and that so often, and in such abundance, as all our princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) died of the same disease. And although the young years of Edward the third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious : yet in that he afterwards caused his own uncle the earl of Kent to die, for no other offence than the desire of his brother's redemption, whom the earl as then supposed to be living (the king making that to be treason in his uncle, which was indeed treason in himself, had his uncle's intelligence been true ; ) this, I say, made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to have it otherwise ; though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

The cruelty, the secret and unsearchable judgment of God revenged, on the grand-child of Edward the third : and so it fell out, even to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried under the ruins of those buildings, of which the mortar had been tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with divers others of his counsellors, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies ; yet he always took himself for over-wise to be taught by examples. The earls of Huntington and Kent, Montague and Spencer, who thought themselves as great politicians in those days, as others have done in these : hoping to please the king, and to secure themselves, by the murder of Glocester ; died soon after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands ; and far more shamefully than did that duke. And as for the king himself (who in regard of many deeds, unworthy of his greatness, cannot be excused, as the disavowing himself by breach of faith, charters, pardons, and patents) he was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his cousin-german and vassal, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the fourth.

This king, whose title was weak, and his obtaining the crown traitorous : who brake faith with the lords at his landing, protesting to intend only the recovery of his proper inheritance ; brake faith with Richard himself ; and brake faith with all the kingdom in parliament, to whom he swore that the deposed king should live. After that he had enjoyed this realm some few years, and in that time had been set upon on all sides by his subjects, and never free from conspiracies and rebellions : he saw (if souls immortal see and discern any things after the bodies death) his grand-child Henry the sixth, and his son the prince, suddenly, and without mercy, murdered ; the possession of the crown (for which he had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race ; and by the issues of his enemies worn and enjoyed : enemies, whom by his own practice he supposed that he had left no less powerless, than the succession of the kingdom questionless ; by entailing the same upon his own issues by parliament. And out of doubt, human reason could have judged no otherwise, but that these cautious provisions of the father, seconded by the valour and signal victories of his son Henry the fifth, had buried the hopes of every competitor, under the despair of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that human reason might so have judged: were not this passage of Casaubon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, evertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundatæ; a day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things, that seemed to have been founded and rooted in adamant.

Now for Henry the sixth, upon whom the great storm of his grandfather's grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done upon Richard the grandchild of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle and innocent prince; yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the house of Navarre, the greatest of the princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match he might have defended his inheritance in France) and married the daughter of Anjou (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his uncle of Glocester, the main and strong pillar of the house of Lancaster; he drew on himself and this kingdom the greatest joint-loss and dishonour, that ever it sustained since the Norman conquest. Of whom it may truly be said, which a counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Qu'il estoit un fort gentil prince; mais son reign est advenu en une fort mauvais temps: That he was a very gentle prince; but his reign happened in a very unfortunate season.

It is true, that Buckingham and Suffolk were the practisers and contrivers of the duke's death: Buckingham and Suffolk, because the duke gave instructions to their authority, which otherwise under the queen had been absolute; the queen, in respect of her personal wound, spretæque injuria formæ, because Glocester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the counsel. For after the cutting down of Glocester, York grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his right, both by arguments and arms; in which quarrel, Suffolk and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of oath by sacrament, it pleased God to strike down York: yet his son the earl of March, following the plain path which his father had trodden out, despoiled Henry the father, and Edward the son, both of their lives and kingdoms. And what was the end now of that politick lady the queen, other than this, That she lived to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: That she lived to look on, while her husband the king, and her only son the prince, were hewen in sunder; while the crown was set on his head that did it. She lived to see her self despoiled of her estate, and of her moveables: and lastly, her father, by rendring up to the crown of France, the earldom of Provence and other places, for the payment of fifty thousand crowns for her ransom, to become a stark beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which <sup>a</sup> Siracides calleth fine, but unrighteous: for other fruit hath it never yielded since the world was.

And now came it to Edward the fourth's turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph. For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted up; one only earl of Richmond excepted: whom also he had once bought of the duke of Britain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a plantation, as could any way promise it self stability. For this Edward the king (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter, which Glocester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the prince in his own presence : of which tragical actors, there was not one that escaped the judgment of God in the same kind. And he, which (besides the execution of his brother of Clarence, for none other offence than he himself had formed in his own imagination) instructed Glocester to kill Henry the sixth, his predecessor ; taught him also by the same art to kill his own sons and successors Edward and Richard. For those kings, which have sold the blood of others at a low rate ; have but made the market for their own enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the third, the greatest master in mischief of all that fore-went him : who although, for the necessity of his tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to perform in his own person, than all the rest ; yet he so well fitted every affection that play'd with him, as if each of them had but acted his own interest. For he wrought so cunningly upon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the queen and to all her kindred ; as he easily allured them to condescend, that Rivers and Grey, the king's maternal uncle and half-brother, should (for the first) be severed from him : secondly, he wrought their consent to have them imprisoned : and lastly (for the avoiding of future inconvenience) to have their heads severed from their bodies. And having now brought those his chief instruments to exercise that common precept, which the devil hath written on every post ; namely, <sup>a</sup> To depress those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had depress'd ; he urged that argument so far and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the young king himself, and of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For he caused it to be hammered into Buckingham's head, That whensoever the king, or his brother, should have able years to exercise their power ; they would take a most severe revenge of that cruel wrong, offered to their uncle and brother, Rivers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his master's sons was without suspect : and yet the devil, who never diswades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when he found by Catesby, who sounded him, that he was not fordable ; he first resolved to kill him sitting in council : wherein having failed with his sword ; he set the hangman upon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could move his appetite, he caused his head to be stricken off, before he eat his dinner. A greater judgment of God, than this upon Hastings, I have never observed in any story. For the self-same day that the earl Rivers, Grey, and others, were (without trial of law, or offence given) by Hastings's advice executed at Pomfret : I say, Hastings himself in the same day, and (as I take it) in the same hour, in the same lawless manner had his head stricken off in the Tower of London. But Buckingham lived a while longer ; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the earldom of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the king's only son ; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant ; he had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his peers. And what success had Richard himself after all these mischiefs and murders, policies and counterpolicies to christian Religion : and after such time, as with a most merciless hand he had pressed out the breath of his nephews and natural lords ; other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it took end, ere himself could well look over and discern it ? The great outcry of innocent blood, obtaining at God's hands the effusion of his ; who became a spectacle of shame and dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruel king, Henry the seventh cut off ; and was therein ( no doubt ) the immediate instrument of God's justice. A politick prince he was, if ever there were any ; and who by the engine of his wisdom, beat down and overturned as many strong oppositions, both before and after he wore the crown, as ever king of England did : I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his affections in the hands of his profit, so he always weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all human actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the eleventh, whom he followed in all that was royal or royal-like, but he was far more just, and begun not their processes, whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could never endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, and therein exceeding wise ; for whatsoever himself gave, he himself received back the thanks and the love, knowing it well that the affections of men ( purchased by nothing so readily as by benefits ) were trains that better became great kings, than great subjects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his subjects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever, the taking off of Stanley's head, who set the crown on his, and the death of the young earl of Warwick, son to George duke of Clarence, shews, as the success also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his ancestors, for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the third and Henry the fourth had done.

Now for king Henry the eighth : if all the pictures and patterns of a merciless prince were lost in the world, they might all again be painted to the life, out of the story of this king. For how many servants did he advance in haste ( but for what virtue no man could suspect ) and with the change of his fancy ruined again ; no man knowing for what offence ? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers, from whence to gather honey, and in the end of harvest burnt them in the hive ? How many wives did he cut off, and cast off, as his fancy and affection changed ? How many princes of the blood ( whereof some of them for age could hardly crawl towards the block ) with a world of others of all degrees ( of whom our common chronicles have kept the account ) did he execute ? Yea, in his very death-bed, and when he was at the point to have given his account to God for the abundance of blood already spilt : he imprisoned the duke of Norfolk the father, and executed the earl of Surrey the son ; the one, whose deservings he knew not how to value, having never omitted any thing that concerned his own honour, and the king's service ; the other, never having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure : the one exceeding valiant and advised ; the other, no less valiant than learned, and of excellent hope. But besides the sorrows which he heaped upon the fatherless, and widows at home ; and besides the vain enterprises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious kings did in their several conquests : what causeless and cruel wars did he make upon his own nephew king James the fifth ? What laws and wills did he devise, to establish this kingdom in his own issues ? Using his sharpest weapons pons to cut off, and cut down those branches, which sprang from the same root that himself did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious provisions) it pleased God to take away all his own, without increase; though, for themselves in their several kinds, all princes of eminent virtue. For these words of Samuel to Agag, king of the Amalekites, have been verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childless: so shall thy mother be childless among other women. And that blood which the same king Henry affirmed, that the cold air of Scotland had frozen up in the north, God hath diffused by the sun-shine of his grace: from whence his majesty now living, and long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly, that if all the malice of the world were infused into one eye: yet could it not discern in his life, even to this day, any one of those foul spots, by which the consciences of all the fore-named princes (in effect) have been defiled; nor any drop of that innocent blood on the sword of his justice, with which the most that forewent him, have stained both their hands and fame. And for this crown of England; it may truly be avowed, that he hath received it even from the hand of God, and hath stayed the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: that he never took revenge of any man that fought to put him beside it: that he refused the assistance of her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as ever princess did: that his majesty entered not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the ordinary gate, which his own right set open; and into which, by a general love and obedience, he was received. And howsoever his majesty's preceding title to this kingdom, was preferred by many princes (witness the treaty at Cambray in the year 1559;) yet he never pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned lady, his predecessor; no, notwithstanding the injury of not being declared heir, in all the time of her long reign.

Neither ought we to forget, or neglect our thankfulness to God for the uniting of the northern parts of Britany to the south; to wit, of Scotland to England; which, though they were severed but by small brooks and banks, yet by reason of the long continued war, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the nations, they were infinitely severed. This, I say, is not the least of God's blessings which his majesty hath brought with him unto this land: No, put all our petty grievances together, and heap them up to their height, they will appear but as a mole-hill, compared with the mountain of this concord. And if all the historians since then, have acknowledged the uniting of the red rose and the white, for the greatest happiness (Christian religion excepted) that ever this kingdom received from God, certainly the peace between the two lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our British blood, heretofore and during the difference so often and abundantly shed, the state of England is more assured, the kingdom more enabled to recover her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more invincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies and conquests. It is true that hereof we do not yet find the effect. But had the duke of Parma, in the year 1588, joined the army which he commanded, with that of Spain, and landed it on the south-coast; and had his majesty at the same time declared himself against us in the north: it is easy to divine what had become of the liberty of England; certainly we would then without murmur have bought this union at a far greater price than it hath since cost us.

It is true, that there was never any commonweal or kingdom in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings live in the world, and not above it. They are not infinite to examine every man's cause, or to relieve every man's wants. And yet, in the latter (though to his own prejudice) his majesty hath had more compassion of other men's necessities, than of his own coffers. Of whom it may be said, as of a Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem Cordis: which if other men do not understand with Pineda to be meant by liberality, but by latitude of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of his majesty, than of any king that ever England had; who, as well in divine as human understanding, hath exceeded all that forewent him, by many degrees.

I could say much more of the king's majesty, without flattery, did I not fear the imputation of presumption, and withal suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine (though the loss were little) as it did the pictures of queen Elizabeth, made by unskilful and common painters; which, by her own commandment, were knock'd in pieces and cast into the fire. For ill artists, in setting out the beauty of the external; and weak writers, in describing the virtues of the internal, do often leave to posterity, of well-formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most perfect and princely minds, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse, if the honest reader but compare the cruel and turbulent passages of our former kings, and of other their neighbour princes (of whom for that purpose I have inserted this brief discourse) with his majesty's temperate, revengeless, and liberal disposition: I say, that if the honest reader weigh them justly, and with an even mind; and withal, but bestow every deformed child on his true parent, he shall find, that there is no man which hath so just cause to complain, as the king himself hath.

Now as we have told the success of the trumperies and cruelties of our own kings, and other great personages; so we find, that God is every-where the same God. And as it pleased him to punish the usurpation, and unnatural cruelty of Henry I., and of our Edward III., in their children for many generations; so dealt he with the sons of Loys Debonaire, the son of Charles the great, or Charlemagne. For after such time as Debonaire of France had torn out the eyes of Bernard his nephew, the son of Pepin, the eldest son of Charlemagne, and heir of the empire, and then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his elder brother; there followed nothing but murders upon murders, poisonings, imprisonments, and civil war, till the whole race of that famous emperor was extinguished.

And though Debonaire, after he had rid himself of his nephew by a violent death; and of his bastard brothers by a civil death (having inclosed them with sure guard, all the days of their lives, within a monastery) held himself secure from all opposition: yet God raised up against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him, to invade him, to take him prisoner, and to depose him; his own sons, with whom (to satisfy their ambition) he had shared his estate, and given them crowns to wear, kingdoms to govern, during his own life. Yea, his eldest son Lothaire (for he had four, three by his first wife, and one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his deposition, that he had used violence towards his brothers and kinsmen; and that he had suffer'd his nephew (whom he might have deliver'd) to be slain, <sup>b</sup> eo quod, saith the text, fratribus &c.

propinquis violentiam intulerit, & nepotem suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interficere permiserit: because he used violence to his brothers and kinsmen, and suffered his nephew to be slain whom he might have delivered.

Yet did he that which few kings do; namely, repent him of his cruelty. For among many other things, which he performed in the general assembly of the states, it follows, a Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus; & imitatus imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, pœnitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this he did openly confess himself to have erred; and following the example of the emperor Theodosius, he underwent voluntary penance as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard, his own nephew.

This he did, and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is unjustly spilt, is not again gathered up from the ground by repentance. These medicines, ministred to the dead, have but dead rewards.

This king, as I have said, had four sons. To Lothaire his eldest he gave the kingdom of Italy; as Charlemagne, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the empire. To Pepin the second son he gave the kingdom of Aquitaine: to Loys, the kingdom of Bavier; and to Charles, whom he had by a second wife, called Judith, the remainder of the kingdom of France. But this second wife, being a mother-in-law to the rest, perswaded Debonaire to cast his son Pepin out of Aquitaine; thereby to greaten Charles: which, after the death of his son Pepin, he prosecuted to effect, against his grand-child bearing the same name. In the mean while, being invaded by his son Loys of Bavier, he dies for grief.

Debonaire dead: Loys of Bavier, and Charles, afterwards call'd the Bald, and their nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, join in league against the emperor Lothaire, their eldest brother. They fight near to Auxerre the most bloody batel that ever was stricken in France: in which, the marvellous loss of nobility, and men of war, gave courage to the Saracens to invade Italy; to the Humes, to fall upon Almaine; and the Danes, to enter upon Normandy. Charles the Bald by treason seizeth upon his nephew Pepin; kills him in a cloyster; Carloman rebels against his father Charles the Bald; the father burns out the eyes of his son Carloman; Bavier invades the emperor Lothaire, his brother; Lothaire quits the empire; he is assailed and wounded to the heart by his own conscience, for his rebellion against his father and for his other cruelties, and dies in a monastery. Charles the Bald, the uncle, oppresseth his nephews, the sons of Lothaire, he usurpeth the empire, to the prejudice of Loys of Bavier, his elder brother; Bavier's armies and his son Carloman are beaten; he dies of grief; and the usurper Charles is poisoned by Zedekias a Jew, his physician; his son Loys le Beque dies of the same drink. Beque had Charles the Simple, and two bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebel against their brother, but the eldest breaks his neck, the younger is slain by a wild boar; the son of Bavier had the same ill destiny, and brake his neck by a fall out of a window in sporting with his companions. Charles the Gross becomes lord of all that the sons of Debonaire held in Germany, wherewith not contented, he invades Charles the Simple; but being forsaken of his nobility, of his wife, and of his understanding, he dies a distracted beggar. Charles the Simple is held in wardship by Eudes, major of the palace; then by Robert, the brother of Eudes; and, lastly, being taken by the earl of Vermandois, he is forced to die in the prison of Peron: Loys, the son of Charles the Simple, breaks his neck in chasing a wolf; and of the two sons of this Loys, the one dies of poison, the other in the prison of Orleans; after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes himself king.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire, who, after he had once appalled injustice with authority, his sons and successors took up the fashion; and wore that garment so long without other provisions, as when the same was torn from their shoulders, every man despised them as miserable and naked beggars. The wretched success they had (saith a learned French-man) shews, que en ceste mort il y avoit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu ou de la justice: That in the death of that prince, to wit, of Bernard, the son of Pepin, the true heir of Charlemagne, men had more meddling than either God or justice had.

But to come nearer home; it is certain that Francis I., one of the worthiest kings (except for that fact) that ever the French-men had, did never enjoy himself, after he had commended the destruction of the protestants of Mirandol and Cabrieres, to the parliament of Provence; which poor people were thereupon burnt, and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true, that the said king Francis repented himself of the fact, and gave charge to Henry, his son, to do justice upon the murderers; threatening his son with God's judgments, if he neglected it. But this unseasonable care of his, God was not pleased to accept for payment. For, after Henry himself was slain in sport by Montgomery, we all may remember what became of his four sons, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which, although three of them became kings, and were married to beautiful and virtuous ladies; yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty and breach of faith, with all their massacres upon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the crown was set upon his head, whom they all laboured to dissolve; the protestants remain more in number than ever they were, and hold to this day more strong cities than ever they had.

Let us now see, if God be not the same God in Spain, as in England and France. Towards whom we will look no farther back than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which prince, all the tyrants of Sicily, our Richard III., and the great Evan Vasilowick of Muscovy, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all christian and heathen kings, having been the most merciless. For besides those of his own blood and nobility, which he caused to be slain in his own court and chamber; as Sancho Ruis, the great master of Calatrava, Ruis Gonzales, Alphonso Tello, and Don John of Arragon, whom he cut in pieces, and cast into the streets, denying him Christian burial: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Percas, Alphonso Gomes, and the great commander of Castile; he made away the two infants of Arragon, his cousin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don John de la Cerde, Albuquerque, Nugnes de Guzman, Cornel, Cabrera, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutierre his great treasurer, and all his kindred; and a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent princes: whom, after he had kept in close prison from their cradles, till one of them had lived sixteen years, and the other fourteen, he murdered them there. Nay, he spared not his mother, nor his wife, the lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the archbishop of Toledo, and the dean, to be killed, of purpose to enjoy their treasures; so did he put to death <sup>a</sup> Mahomet Aben Alhamar, king of Barbary, with thirty-seven of his nobility, that came unto him for succour, with a great sum of money, to levy (by his favour) some companies of soldiers to return withal. Yea, he would needs assist the hangman with his own hand, in the execution of the old king; insomuch as pope Urban declared him an enemy both to God and man. But what was his end? Having been formerly beaten out of his kingdom, and re-established by the valour of the English nation, led by the famous duke of Lancaster: he was stabbed to death by his younger brother the earl of Astramara, who dispossessed all his children of their inheritance; which, but for the father's injustice and cruelty, had never been in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this king, it must be duke John of Burgogne; who, after his traiterous murder of the duke of Orleans, caused the constable of Armagnac, the chancellor of France, the bishops of Constance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reverend church-men, the earl of gran Pre, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the officers of justice, of the chamber of accompts, treasury and request (with sixteen hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slain. Hereby, while he hoped to govern, and to have mastered France: he was soon after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the <sup>a</sup> Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slain. These were the lovers of other men's miseries, and misery found them out.

Now for the kings of Spain, which lived both with Henry VII, Henry VIII, queen Mary, and queen Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first; and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this king did not content himself to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his ancestor, and to fasten thereunto the kingdom of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong hand, and his assistance, from her own niece, the daughter of the last Henry; but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right: he also cast his own niece out of the kingdom of Navarre; and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places, and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any army to invade it. This king, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick, kings of Naples, princes of his own blood, and by double alliance tied unto him, sold them unto the French; and with the same army, sent for their succour under Gonsalvo, cast them out; and shared their kingdom with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politick king, who sold heaven and his own honour, to make his son, the prince of Spain, the greatest monarch of the world, saw him die in the flower of his years; and his wife, great with child with her untimely birth, at once and together buried. His eldest daughter, married unto Don Alphonso, prince of Portugal, beheld her first husband break his neck in her presence; and, being with child by her second, died with it. A just judgment of God upon the race of John, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished, who had not only left many disconsolate mothers in Portugal, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slain, with his own hand, the son and only comfort of his aunt, the lady Beatrix, dutchess of Visco. The second daughter of Ferdinand, married, to the archduke Philip, turned fool, and died mad and deprived. His third daughter, bestowed on king Henry VIII, he saw cast off by the king, the mother of many troubles in England; and the mother of a daughter, that, in her unhappy zeal, shed a world of innocent blood; lost Calais to the French; and died heart-broken without increase.

To conclude, all those kingdoms of Ferdinand have masters of a new name; and, by a strange family, are governed and possess'd.

Charles V, son to the archduke Philip, in whose vain enterprizes upon the French, upon the Almaines, and other princes and states, so many multitudes of Christian soldiers, and renowned captains, were consumed, who gave the while a most perilous entrance to the Turks, and suffered Rhodes, the key of christendom, to be taken, was, in conclusion, chased out of France; and, in a sort, out of Germany; and left to the French, Metz, Toul, and Verdun, places belonging to the empire; stole away from Inspruck, and scaled the Alps by torch-light, pursued by duke Maurice; having hoped to swallow up all those dominions, wherein he concocted nothing save his own disgraces. And having, after the slaughter of so many millions of men, no one foot of ground in either, <sup>a</sup> he crept into a cloyster, and made himself a pensioner of an hundred thousand duckets by the year to his son Philip, from whom he very slowly received his mean and ordinary maintenance.

His son again, king Philip II, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand (wrested by his ancestors from Jaqueline, their lawful princess) and to possess in peace many other provinces of the Netherlands, perswaded by that mischievous cardinal of Granvil, and other Romish tyrants; not only forgot the most remarkable services done to his father the emperor, by the nobility of those countries; not only forgot the present made him upon his entry of forty millions of florins, called the <sup>b</sup> Noval aid; nor only forgot that he had twice most solemnly sworn to the general states, to maintain and preserve their ancient rights, privileges, and customs, which they had enjoyed under their thirty-five earls before him, conditional princes of those provinces; but beginning first to constrain them, and enthrall them by the Spanish inquisition, and then to impoverish them by many new devised and intolerable impositions: he, lastly, by strong hand and main force, attempted to make himself not only an absolute monarch over them, like unto the kings and sovereigns of England and France; but, Turk-like, to tread under his feet all their national and fundamental laws, privileges, and ancient rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the pope a dispensation of his former oaths (which dispensation was the true cause of the war and blood-shed since then;) and, after he had tried what he could perform, by dividing of their own nobility under the government of his base sister Margaret of Austria, and the cardinal Granvil, he employed that most merciless Spaniard Don Ferdinand Alvarez of Toldeo, duke of Alva, followed with a powerful army of strange nations, by whom he first slaughter'd that renowned captain the earl of Egmont, prince of Gavare; and Philip Montmorency, earl of Horn, made away Montague, and the marquis of Bergues; and cut off in those six years (that Alva governed) of gentlemen and others, eighteen thousand and six hundred, by the hands of the hangman, besides all his other barbarous murders and massacres. By whose ministry, when he could not yet bring his affairs to their wished ends, having it in his hope to work that by subtilty, which he had failed to perform by force: he sent for governor his bastard brother Don John of Austria, a prince of great hope, and very gracious to those people. But he, using the same papal advantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take oath upon the Holy Evangelists, to observe the treaty made with the general states; and to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, and other strangers, therein garrisoned. Towards whose pay and passport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of six hundred thousand pounds. Which monies received, he suddenly surpris'd the citadels of Antwerp and Namure, not doubting (being unsuspected by the states) to have possessed himself of all the mastering places of those provinces: for whatsoever he overtly pretended, he held in secret a contrary council with the secretary Escovedo, Rhodus, Barlemont, and others, ministers of the Spanish tyranny, formerly practis'd, and now again intended. But let us now see the effect and end of this perjury, and of all other the duke's cruelties. First for himself, after he had murdered so many of the nobility, executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in six years; and most cruelly slain man, woman and child, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Nacarden, and other places; and after he had consumed thirty-six millions of treasure in six years, notwithstanding his Spanish vaunt, that he would suffocate the Hollanders in their own butter-barrels and milk-tubs, he departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse and detestation of the whole nation, leaving his master's affairs in a ten-fold worse estate, than he found them at his first arrival. For Don John, whose haughty conceit of himself, overcame the greatest difficulties; though his judgment were over-weak to manage the least; what wonders did his fearful breach of faith bring forth, other than the king his brother's jealousy and distrust, together with the untimely death that seized him, even in the flower of his youth. And for Escovedo's sharp-witted secretary, who, in his own imagination, had conquered for his master both England and the Netherlands; being sent into Spain upon some new project, he was at the first arrival, and before any access to the king, by certain ruffians, appointed by Anthony Peres, (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the king of Spain's carriage, his council, and success in this business; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid above an hundred millions, and the lives of above four hundred thousand Christians, for the loss of all those countries; which, for beauty, gave place to none; and, for revenue, did equal his West-Indies; for the loss of a nation, which most willingly obeyed him; and who at this day, after forty years wars, are, in despite of all his forces, become a free estate, and far more rich and powerful than they were, when he first began to impoverish and oppress them.

Oh, by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and under what reasons of state and politic subtilty, have these fore-named kings, both strangers, and of our own nation, pulled the vengeance of God upon themselves, upon theirs, and upon their prudent ministers! and in the end have brought those things to pass for their enemies, and seen an effect so directly contrary to all their own counsels and cruelties; as the one could never have hoped for themselves; and the other never have succeeded, if no such opposition had ever been made. God hath said it and performed it ever: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? And to what end do we lay before the eyes of the living, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath been; and the children of the present time will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times we have, we hold all things lawful; and either we hope to hold them for ever, or at least we hope, there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For, as we are content to forget our own experience, and to counterfeit the ignorance of our own knowledge, in all things that concern our selves;

or perswade our selves, that God hath given us letters patent, to pursue all our irreligious affections with a non obstante : so we neither look behind us what hath been, nor before us what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we have, is of the body : we are by it joined to the earth ; we are compounded of earth ; and we inhabit it. The heavens are high, far off, and unsearchable ; we have sense and feeling of corporal things, and of eternal grace, but by revelation. No marvel then that our thoughts are also earthly : and it is less to be wondered at, that the words of worthless men cannot cleanse them ; seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose understanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, have not performed it. For as the prophet Isaiab cried out long ago, Lord, who hath believed our reports ? And out of doubt, as Isaiab complained then for himself and others ; so are they less believed every day after other. For although religion, and the truth thereof, be in every man's mouth, yea, in the discourse of every woman, who, for the greatest number, are but <sup>a</sup> Idols of vanity ; what is it other than an universal dissimulation ? We profess that we know God, but by works we deny him. For beatitude doth not consist in the knowledge of divine things, but in a divine life ; for the devils know them better than men. Beatitudo non est divinarum cognitio, sed vita divina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to be lamented, than the private contention, the passionate dispute, the personal hatred, and the perpetual war, massacres, and murders, for religion among Christians ; the discourse whereof hath so occupied the world, as it hath well-near driven the practice thereof out of the world. Who would not soon resolve, that took knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their lives which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of heaven ; and that the world it self were but used as it ought, and as an inn or place, wherein to repose our selves in passing on towards our celestial habitation ? When, on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soul hath nothing but hypocrisy. We are all (in effect) become comedians in religion ; and while we act in gesture and voice, divine virtues, in all the course of our lives we renounce our persons, and the parts we play. For charity, justice, and truth, have but their being in terms, like the philosophers Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon defineth to be the School-mistress of the knowledge of God, that hath valuation in the world : it is enough that we give it our good word ; but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the world, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtain honour, with the many respects which attend it.

These indeed be the marks, which (when we have bent our consciences to the highest) we all shoot at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our own ; the care our own in this life, the peril our own in the future : and yet when we have gathered the greatest abundance, we our selves enjoy no more thereof, than so much as belongs to one man. For the rest ; He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that ever man had, hath told us that this is the use : <sup>b</sup> When goods increase (saith Salomon) they also increase that eat them ; and what good cometh to the owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes ? As for those that devour the rest, and follow us in fair weather ; they again forsake us in the first tempest of misfortune, and steer away before the sea and wind ; leaving us to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of master Daniel, and use his own words : Whilst the emperor Charles the fifth, after the resignation of his estates, stayed at Vlusching for wind, to carry him his last journey into Spain ; he conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinand's ambassadour, till the deep of the night. And when Seldius should depart, the emperor calling for some of his servants, and no body answering him (for those that attended upon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleep) the emperor took up the candle himself, and went before Seldius to light him down the stairs ; and so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when he was come to the stairs foot, he said thus unto him : Seldius, remember this of Charles the emperor, when he shall be dead and gone, That him, whom thou hast known in thy time invironed with so many mighty armies, and guards of soldiers, thou hast also seen alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea even of his own domestick servants, &c. I acknowledge this change of fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of God ; which I will by no means go about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first, is the reverend respect that is held of great men, and the honour done unto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed : provided, that an inward love for their justice and piety, accompany the outward worship given to their places and power ; without which what is the applause of the multitude, but as the outcry of an herd of animals, who, without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noise they make ? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish virtue and fortune : the most impious (if prosperous) have ever been applauded ; the most virtuous (if unprosperous) have ever been despised. For as fortune's man rides the horse, so fortune her self rides the man. Who, when he is descended and on foot : the man taken from his beast, and fortune from the man ; a base groom beats the one, and a bitter contempt spurns at the other, with equal liberty.

The second, is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leave behind us. Certainly, of those which conceive that their souls departed take any comfort therein, it may truly be said of them, which Lactantius spake of certain heathen philosophers, a quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortal bodies, and disposed by God : there remaineth in them no other joy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeth in the wall of a king's palace ; nor any other sorrow for their poverty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth up a beggar's cottage. b Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt vivi, etiam eorum filii ; quia animæ mortuorum rebus viventium non intersunt. The dead, though holy, know nothing of the living, no, not of their own children ; for the souls of those departed, are not conversant with their affairs that remain. And if we doubt of Saint Augustine, we cannot of Job ; who tells us, c That we know not if our sons shall be honourable : neither shall we understand concerning them, whether they shall be of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth : d Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himself in vain : he heapeth up riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The living (saith he) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all. For who can shew unto man, what shall be after him under the sun ? He therefore accounteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and travel in the world, not knowing after death, whether a fool or a wise man should enjoy the fruits thereof : which made me (saith he) endeavour even to abhor mine own labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowful estates after death God hath reserved? man's knowledge lying but in his hope; seeing the prophet Esay confesseth of the elect, <sup>a</sup> That Abraham is ignorant of us, and Israel knows us not. But hereof we are assured, that the long and dark night of death: of whose following day we shall never behold the dawn (till his return that hath triumphed over it) shall cover us over, till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall again receive organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of angelical affections: in so great admiration shall the souls of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or less joy; nor any return of forgone and mortal affection, towards friends, kindred or children. Of whom whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure us; and the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; if a divine life retain any of those faculties, which the soul exercised in a mortal body; we shall not at that time so divide the joys of heaven, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remain in the world. No; be their estates greater than ever the world gave, we shall (by the difference known unto us) even detest their consideration. And whatsoever comfort shall remain of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised living: and in that piety, justice, and firm faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of us, and receive us. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing, and neglect them, as unnecessary and vain? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his angels by degrees: which hath given greater and less light and beauty to heavenly bodies: which hath made differences between beasts and birds: created the eagle and the fly, the cedar and the shrub: and among stones, given the fairest tincture to the ruby, and the quickest light to the diamond; hath also ordained kings, dukes or leaders of the people, magistrates, judges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a mark and ensign of the virtue and understanding of their ancestors: so, seeing <sup>b</sup> Siracides preferreth death before beggary: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall under the miserable succour of other men's pity; I account it foolishness to condemn such a care: provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our own buildings out of other men's ruins. For as <sup>c</sup> Plato doth first prefer the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the form and beauty; and thirdly, Divitias nulla fraude quasitas: so Jeremy cries, <sup>d</sup> Woe unto them that erect their houses by unrighteousness, and their chambers without equity: and Esay the same, <sup>e</sup> Woe to those that spoil, and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Solomon, that he commandeth us, <sup>f</sup> not to drink the wine of violence; not to lie in wait for blood; and not to swallow them up alive, whose riches we covet: for such are the ways (saith he) of every one that is greedy of gain.

And if we could afford our selves but so much leisure as to consider; That he, which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he, which hath the longest time lent him to live in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past when we were not, or by that time which is to come in which we shall abide for ever: I say, if both, to wit our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing; it is not out of any excellency of understanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath

(in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coveting those mortal things of the world, as if our souls were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selves after the world were but mortal.

But let every man value his own wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the rich man think all fools, that cannot equal his abundance; the revenger esteem all negligent, that have not trodden down their opposites; the politician, all gross, that cannot merchandize their faith: yet when we once come in sight of the port of death, to which all winds drive us; and when by letting fall that fatal anchor, which can never be weighed again, the navigation of this life takes end: Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad and severe cogitations, formerly beaten from us by our health and felicity) return again, and pay us to the uttermost for all the pleasing passages of our lives past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selves can no longer exercise cruelty towards others: and it is only then, that we are stricken through the soul with this terrible sentence, a That God will not be mock'd. For if, according to St. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saved: and that God spared not his angels: where shall those appear, who, having served their appetites all their lives, presume to think, that the severe commandments of the All-powerful God were given but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth us, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reverend father, cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt: I confess that it is a great comfort to our friends, to have it said, that we ended well: for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming, an opposing, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if those men do not oppose him, disesteem him, and mock him, that think it enough for God, to ask him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what do they otherwise, that die this kind of well-dying, but say unto God as followeth? We beseech thee, O God, that all the falsehoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our lives past, may be pleasing unto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that had no leisure to do any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a just God; that thou wilt love injuries and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishness. For I shall prejudice my son (which I am resolved not to do) if I make restitution; and confess my self to have been unjust (which I am too proud to do) if I deliver the oppressed. Certainly, these wise worldlings have either found out a new God; or have made one: and in all likelihood such a leaden one, as Lewis the eleventh wore in his cap; which, when he had caused any that he feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kiss it: beseeching it to pardon him this one evil act more, and it should be the last; which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinal and a falsified sacrament, he caused the earl of Armagnac to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be used towards a leaden, but not towards the ever-living God. But of this composition are all the devout lovers of the world, that they fear all that is dureless and ridiculous: they fear the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they fear the opinions of men which beat but upon shadows: they flatter and forsake the prosperous and unprosperous, be they friends or kings: yea they dive under water, like ducks, at every pebble-stone, that's but thrown towards them by a powerful hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and giant-like valour, against the terrible judgments of the All-powerful God: yea, they shew themselves gods against God, and slaves towards men; towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions; to wit of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate; and of the poor and oppressed, whom we account wretched: we shall find the happiness of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subject to interchange (witness the sudden downfall of the greatest princes, and the speedy uprising of the meanest persons) as the one hath nothing so certain, whereof to boast; nor the other so uncertain, whereof to bewail it self. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health or life; but that he may be deprived of either or all, the very next hour or day to come. Quid vesper veuat, incertum est; What the evening will bring with it, is uncertain. And yet ye cannot tell (saith Saint James) what shall be to morrow. a To day he is set up, and to morrow he shall not be found? for he is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the air which compasseth adversity, be very obscure: yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which environeth worldly glory; through which, for the clearness thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let adversity seem what it will; to happy men, ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other men's misfortunes; and to those under the cross, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equal to either. For be it that we have lived many years, and (according to Solomon) in them all we have rejoyced; or be it that we have measured the same length of days, and therein have evermore sorrowed: yet looking back from our present being, we find both the one and the other, to wit, the joy and the woe, failed out of sight; and death, which doth pursue us and hold us in chase, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid ætatis retro est, mors tenet: Whatsoever of our age is past, death holds it. So as whosoever he be, to whom fortune hath been a servant, and the time a friend: let him but take the account of his memory (for we have no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved, either of beauty and youth, or foregone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last, of his dearest affections, or of whatever else the amorous spring-time gave his thoughts of contentment, then unvaluable; and he shall find, that all the art which his elder years have, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions, than heavy, secret, and sad sighs. He shall find nothing remaining, but those sorrows, which grow up after our fast-springing youth; overtake it, when it is at a stand; and over-top it utterly, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking back from the very instant time, and from our now being; the poor, diseased, and captive creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and pains; as he, that is most bless'd in common opinion, hath of his fore-past pleasures and delights. For whatsoever is cast behind us, is just nothing: and what is to come, deceitful hope hath it. Omnia quæ ventura sunt, in incerto jacent. Only those few black swans I must except, who having had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their own price; do, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-acted life, behold death without dread, and the grave without fear; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endless glory.

For my self, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrows of this life, are but of two sorts : whereof the one hath respect to God ; the other, to the world. In the first, we complain to God against our selves, for our offences against him ; and confess, Et tu justus es in omnibus quæ venerunt super nos ; And thou, O Lord, art just in all that hath befallen us. In the second, we complain to our selves against God, as if he had done us wrong, either in not giving us worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites ; or for taking them again from us, having had them : forgetting that humble and just acknowledgment of Job, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken. To the first of which St. Paul hath promised blessedness ; to the second, death. And out of doubt he is either a fool or ungrateful to God, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how mean soever his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him : or doth not acknowledge, how sharp soever his afflictions be, that the same are yet far less, than those which are due unto him. And if an heathen wise man call the adversities of the world, but tributa vivendi, the tributes of living : a wise Christian man ought to know them, and bear them, but as the tributes of offending. He ought to bear them manlike, and resolvedly ; and not as those whining soldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur Imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the author of all our tragedies, hath written out for us, and appointed us all the parts we are to play : and hath not, in their distribution, been partial to the most mighty princes of the world ; That gave unto Darius the part of the greatest emperor, and the part of the most miserable beggar, a beggar begging water of an enemy, to quench the great drought of death ; That appointed Bajazet to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, and in the same day the footstool of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also played, being taken by Sapores) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious captain, and lastly the part of a blind beggar ; of which examples many thousands may be produced : why should other men, who are but as the least worms, complain of wrongs ? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theatre, is but as the change of garments on the less. For when on the one and the other, every man wears but his own skin ; the players are all alike. Now if any man, out of weakness, prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est revocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasy of ours, which forgeth in the brains of man all the miseries (the corporal excepted) whereunto he is subject : therein it is, that misfortune and adversity work all that they work. For seeing death, in the end of the play, takes from all, whatsoever fortune or force takes from any one : it were a foolish madness in the shipwreck of worldly things, where all sinks but the sorrow, to save it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato ; To fall under fortune, of all other the most miserable destiny.

But it is now time to sound a retreat ; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit : and withal, that the good intent, which hath moved me to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of divine providence, every-where found (the first divine histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) have persuaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things ; to wit,

creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so near, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: creation, inferring providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten? and providence presupposing creation) yet many of those that have seemed to excel in worldly wisdom, have gone about to disjoin this coherence; the Epicure denying both creation and providence, but granting that the world had a beginning; the Aristotelian granting providence, but denying both the creation and the beginning.

Now although this doctrine of faith, touching the creation in time (for by faith we understand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a work for Aristotle's rotten ground to bear up, upon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the defences and fortresses of all his verbal doctrine: yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the world's beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary, even in the judgment of natural reason, wherein he believed, had not better informed him; it is greatly to be marvelled at. And it is no less strange, that those men, which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this main point; and taught little other than terms in the rest) have so retrench'd their minds from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subjected themselves to the law of those philosophical principles; as all contrary kind of teaching, in the search of causes, they have condemned either for phantastical, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of heathen philosophers, are undoubted grounds and principles indeed, because so called? Or that ipsi dixerunt, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where natural reason hath built any thing so strong against it self, as the same reason can hardly assail it, much less batter it down: the same in every question of nature, and finite power, may be approved for a fundamental law of human knowledge. For faith <sup>a</sup> Charron, in his book of wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorite que l'autre, si la raison n'en fait la difference; Every human proposition hath equal authority, if reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. But hereof how shall the upright and impartial judgment of man give a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to give in evidence? And to this purpose it was well said of <sup>b</sup> Lactantius, Sapientiam sibi adimunt, qui sine ullo judicio inventa majorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur: They neglect their own wisdom, who without any judgment approve the invention of those that forewent them; and suffer themselves, after the manner of beasts, to be led by them. By the advantage of which sloth and dulness, ignorance is now become so powerful a tyrant: as it hath set true philosophy, physick, and divinity, in a pillory; and written over the first, Contra negantem principia; over the second, Virtus specifica; and over the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my self, I shall never be perswaded, that God hath shut up all light of learning within the lantern of Aristotle's brains: or that it was ever said unto him, as unto Esdras, Accendam in corde tuo lucernam intellectus: that God hath given invention but to the heathen; and that they only have invaded nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same nature having consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these, and these be the causes of these and these effects, time hath taught us; and not reason: and so hath experience, without art. The cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the philosopher, that sour runnet doth coagulate her milk into a curd. But if we ask a reason of this cause, why the sourness doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I think that there is nothing to be found in vulgar philosophy, to satisfy this and many other like vulgar questions. But man, to cover his ignorance in the least things, who cannot give a true reason for the grass under his feet, why it should be green rather than red, or of any other colour; that could never yet discover the way and reason of nature's working, in those which are far less noble creatures than himself; who is far more noble than the heavens themselves: Man (saith <sup>a</sup> Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are upon the earth, and with great labour find out the things that are before us; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learn, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his understanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the essence of his own soul, and which the wisest of the naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could never so much as define, but by the action and effect, telling us what it works (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but God that created it (for though I were perfect, yet I know not my soul, saith Job.) Man, I say, that is but an idiot in the next cause of his own life, and in the cause of all the actions of his life, will (notwithstanding) examine the art of God in creating the world; of God, who (saith <sup>b</sup> Job) is so excellent as we know him not; and examine the beginning of the work, which had end before mankind had a beginning of being. He will disable God's power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather give the moths of the air for a cause; cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on nature; make two powers, the one to be the author of the matter, the other of the form; and lastly, for want of a workman, have it eternal: which latter opinion Aristotle, to make himself the author of a new doctrine, brought into the world: and his sectators have maintained it; parati ac conjurati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis invictis opiniones tueri. For Hermes, who lived at once with, or soon after, Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Animenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Steuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of invincible reason, one eternal and infinite Being, to be the parent of the universal. Horum omnium sententia quamvis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, ut Providentiam unam esse consentiant: sive enim Natura, sive Æther, sive Ratio, sive mens, sive fatalis necessitas, sive divina Lex; idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus. All these mens opinions (saith <sup>c</sup> Lactantius) though uncertain, come to this, That they agree upon one Providence; whether the same be Nature, or Light, or Reason, or understanding, or destiny, or divine Ordinance; that it is the same which we call God. Certainly, as all the rivers in the world, though they have divers risings, and divers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while under ground, and seem to be lost in sea-like lakes; do at last find, and fall into the great ocean: so after all the searches that human capacity hath; and after all philosophical contemplation and curiosity; in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolves it self.

As for others; and first touching those, which conceive the matter of the world to have been eternal, and that God did not create the world ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith <sup>d</sup> Eusebias) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annexere. They seem unto me, which affirm this, to give part of the work to God, and part to fortune. Insomuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, he had neither been Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the universal. For were the matter or chaos, eternal : it then follows, That either this supposed matter did fit it self to God ; or God, accommodate himself to the matter. For the first ; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the workman's will. For the second ; it were horrible to conceive of God, That as an artificer he applied himself, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted upon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter had been made by any power, not omnipotent and infinitely wise : I would gladly learn how it came to pass, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was omnipotent and infinitely wise ; and no more, nor no less, than served to receive the form of the universal. For, had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient ; then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as served to finish the work of the world : or had there been more of this matter, than sufficed ; then did God dissolve and annihilate whatsoever remained and was superfluous. And thus must every reasonable soul confess, That it is the same work of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing ; and by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternal matter, be again changed into nothing ; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it self ; this, of all other, were the greatest idiotism. For, if it were the cause of it self at any time ; then there was also a time when it self was not : at which time of not being, it is easy enough to conceive, that it would neither produce it self, nor any thing else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible, Nil autem seipsum præcedit, neque seipsum componit corpus ; There is nothing that doth precede it self, neither do bodies compound themselves.

For the rest ; Those that feign this matter to be eternal, must of necessity confess, that infinite cannot be separate from eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite form, but that the first matter was finite, the form which it received proves it. For conclusion of this part ; whosoever will make choice, rather to believe in eternal deformity, or in eternal dead matter, than in eternal light and eternal life : let eternal death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth terms to express it. For what reason of man (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it self, either for matter or form ; yea for as many worlds (if such had been God's will) as the sea hath sands ? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workman's will. Yea reason it self finds it more easy for infinite power, to deliver from it self a finite world, without the help of matter prepared ; than for a finite man, a fool and dust, to change the form of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius's words, Deus in una existentia omnia præbabet : and again, Esse omnium est ipsa divinitas, omne quod vides, & quod non vides ; to wit, causaliter, or in better terms, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa universalis. Neither hath the world universal closed up all of God : For the most parts of his works (saith a Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom be opened, by the glorious work of the world :

which never brought to knowledge all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes, that we seldom entitle God, the all-shewing, or the all-willing, but the all-mighty; that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing, nothing is made, infer the world's eternity; and yet not so salvage therein, as those are, which give an eternal being to dead matter: it is true, if the word [nothing] be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed upon natural agents and finite power; that out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himself confesseth, Quod omnes antiqui decreverunt quasi quoddam rerum principium, ipsumque infinitum; That all the ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, a Principium ejus est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia complecti ac regere. It is strange that this philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falshood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the world universal, and all the unmeasurable orbs of heaven, and those marvellous bodies of the sun, moon, and stars, with ipsum infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirmeth of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionem) is no wonder in God's power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, and Empedocles, call the world universal; but particulam universitatis & infinitatis; A parcel of that which is the universality and the infinity it self; and Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to prove the world's eternity, urgeth this maxim; That, A sufficient and effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect thereof is also granted: inferring, that God being for ever a sufficient and effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also have been for ever; to wit, the world universal. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a master, to confess a sufficient and effectual cause of the world (to wit, an almighty God) in his antecedent; and the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion; to make God free in power, and bound in will; able to effect, unable to determine; able to make all things, and yet unable to make choice of the time when; For this were impiously to resolve of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor understanding; which cannot but work matter being present; as fire, to burn things combustible.

Again, he thus disputeth, That every agent which can work, and doth not work; if it afterward work, it is either thereto moved by it self, or by somewhat else; and so it passeth from power to act. But God (saith he) is immoveable, and is neither moved by himself, nor by any other; but being always the same, doth always work: whence he concludeth, if the world were caused by God, that he was for ever the cause thereof, and therefore eternal. The answer to this is very easy; for that God's performing in due time that, which he ever determined at length to perform, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for ever, did also withhold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it self sufficient, others add further, that the pattern or image of the world may be said to be eternal; which the Platonicks call, spiritualium mundum; and do in this sort distinguish the idea, and creation in time. <sup>a</sup> Spiritualis ille mundus, mundi hujus exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita æquali est architecto; fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit jam ab opifice ex parte una, quia non fuit semper; retinet alteram, quia sit semper futurus. That representative, or the intentional world (say they) the samplar of this visible world, the first work of God, was equally ancient with the architect; for it was for ever with him, and ever shall be. This material world, the second work or creature of God, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from everlasting; and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for ever to come. The first point, That it was not for ever, all Christians confess: the other they understand no otherwise, than that after the consummation of this world, there shall be a new heaven and a new earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue; though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding; in this consideration, of an eternal and unchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporal effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That the compounded essence of the world (and because compounded, therefore dissipable) is continued, and knit to the divine Being, by an individual and inseparable power, flowing from divine unity; and that the world's natural appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a goodness and understanding divine; and that this virtue, by which the world is continued and knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and everlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite virtue, the finite world (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the divine infinite, according to the temporal nature it hath, successively every moment by little and little; even as the whole material world is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed; as the shadow of a tree in a river, seemeth to have continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continual ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to return to them, which denying, that ever the world had any beginning, withal deny that ever it shall have any end; and to this purpose affirm, that it was never heard, never read, never seen, no, not by any reason perceived, that the heavens have ever suffered corruption; or that they appear any way the elder by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which, had they been subject to final corruption, some change would have been discerned in so long a time: to this it is answered, that the little change as yet perceived, doth rather prove their newness, and that they have not continued so long; thar that they would continue for ever as they are. And if conjectural arguments may receive answer by conjectures, it then seemeth, that some alteration may be found. For either <sup>b</sup> Aristotle, Pliny, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossly mistaken; or else those parts of the world lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the sun's heat; neither were the seas under the equinoctial, navigable. But we know by experience, that those regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the sea, over which we navigate, passable enough. We read also many histories of deluges, and how that in the time of Phaeton, divers places in the world were burnt up by the sun's violent heat.

But in a word, this observation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, that stone walls, of matter mouldering and friable, have stood two or three thousand years; and that many things have been digged up out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to have been buried by the general flood, without any alteration of substance or figure; yea, it is believed, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in mines and rocks, under-ground, was created together with the earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times have not invaded and corrupted; what great alteration should we look for in celestial and quintessential bodies? And yet we have reason to think, that the sun, by whose help all creatures are generate, doth not in these latter ages assist nature, as heretofore. We have neither giants, such as the eldest world had; nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in general are reputed of less virtue, which from the heavens receive virtue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proof; as that this world shall at length have end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can be made to this objection: if the world were eternal, why not all things in the world eternal? If there were no First, no Cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible Wisdom, but that every nature had been alike eternal; and man more rational than every other nature: why had not the eternal reason of man, provided for his eternal being in the world? For if all were equal; why not equal conditions to all? why should heavenly bodies live for ever, and the bodies of men rot and die.

Again, who was it that appointed the earth to keep the center, and gave order that it should hang in the air; that the sun should travel between the tropicks, and never exceed those bounds, nor fail to perform that progress once in every year; the moon to live by borrowed light; the fix'd stars (according to common opinion) to be fastened like nails in a cart-wheel, and the planets to wander at their pleasure? Or, if none of these had power over other; was it out of charity and love, that the sun, by his perpetual travel within those two circles, hath visited, given light unto, and relieved all parts of the earth, and the creatures therein, by turns and times? Out of doubt, if the sun have of his own accord kept this course in all eternity, he may justly be called eternal charity, and everlasting love. The same may be said of all the stars, who, being all of them most large and clear fountains of virtue and operation, may also be called eternal virtues; the earth may be called eternal patience; the moon an eternal borrower and beggar; and man, of all other, the most miserable, eternally mortal. And what were this, but to believe again in the old play of the gods? Yea, in more gods by millions, than ever Hesiodus dream'd of. But, instead of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble and mortal eyes; and the eyes of our reason discern it better; that the sun, moon, stars, and the earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they have not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinaverit; Every thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the school of Aristotle hath both commended many errors unto us, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the creation, and in the governing of the world: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotle's physicks, or primo de Cælo or out of the fifth of his metaphysicks; I say, that the best is but nominal and serving only to difference the beginning of natural motion from artificial: which yet the academics open better, when they call it A seminary strength, infused into matter by the soul of the world, who give the first place to Providence, the second to fate, and but the third to nature. Providentia (by which they understand God) dux & caput; fatum, medium <sup>ex</sup> Providentia prodiens; natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or understanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath avowed. For this is unanswerable of <sup>a</sup> Lactantius: Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam; He only can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of nature, are in these words truly expressed by <sup>b</sup> Ficinus: Potest ubique natura, vel per diversa media, vel ex diversis materiis, diversa facere: sublata vero mediorum materialiumque diversitate, vel unicum vel simillimum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of nature by diversity of means, or out of diversity of matter, to produce divers things: but taking away the diversity of means, and the diversity of matter, it then works but one or the like work; neither can it but work, matter being present. Now if nature made choice of diversity of matter, to work all these variable works of heaven and earth, it had then both understanding and will; it had counsel to begin; reason to dispose; virtue and knowledge to finish; and power to govern; without which, all things had been but one and the same; all of the matter of heaven; or all of the matter of earth. And if we grant nature this will, and this understanding, this counsel, reason, and power: <sup>c</sup> Cur natura potius, quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather nature, than God? God, of whom all men have notion, and give the first and highest place to divine power: <sup>d</sup> Omnes homines rationem deorum habent, omnesque summum locum divino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short, that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vera sunt, & semper eadem: True philosophy, is an ascending from the things which flow, and rise, and fall, to the things that are for ever the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and nature: be it but in terms. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his own will; and maketh of one earth, vessels of honour and dishonour. It is nature that can dispose of nothing; but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God, that commandeth all; it is nature that is obedient to all; it is God that doth good unto all, knowing and loving the good he doth; it is nature, that secondarily doth also good, but it neither knoweth nor loveth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himself; nature, nothing in it self. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things; it is nature, which is begotten by all things; in which it liveth and laboureth; for by it self it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the earth, that heavy things fall towards it? Shall we call it reason, which doth conduct every river into the salt sea? Shall we term it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matter? If it be affection, reason, and knowledge in these; by the same affection, reason, and knowledge it is, that nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things work as they do (call it by form, by nature, or by what you please :) yet because they work by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supremest power, we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder, and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a nature in things, and such a faculty, as, neither knowing it self, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the virtue and power which it hath, doth yet work all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore every reasonable man, taking to himself for a ground that which is granted by all antiquity, and by all men truly learned that ever the world had; to wit, that there is a power infinite and eternal (which also necessity doth prove unto us, without the help of faith; and reason, without the force of authority;) all things do as easily follow which have been delivered by divine letters, as the waters of a running river do successively pursue each other from the first fountains.

This much I say it is, that reason it self hath taught us; and this is the beginning of knowledge. <sup>a</sup> Sapientia præcedit, religio sequitur; quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere: Sapience goes before, religion follows; because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This sapience Plato calleth, absoluti boni scientiam; The science of the absolute good: and another, Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For faith (faith <sup>b</sup> Isidore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded; fides nequaquam vi extorquetur; sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confess it, that to enquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his art, and by what mean he created the world; or of his secret judgment, and the causes; is not an effect of reason: Sed cum ratione insaniunt; but they grow mad with reason, that enquire after it. For as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French author) de faire arrest au but qu'on n'a seu surpasser; For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to pass on further: so whatsoever is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason, it acknowledgeth it to be so; as <sup>c</sup> understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the name and nature it hath, to be a teacher, that best knows the end of his own art. For seeing both reason and necessity teach us (reason, which is pars divini spiritus in corpus humanum merse) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach us; and seeing the same reason and necessity make us know that the same infinite power is every-where in the world; and yet how every-where, it cannot inform us, our belief hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened by our ignorance; because it is the same reason that tells us, that such a nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

I have been already over-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following story, or in mine own excuse; especially in the excuse of this or that passage, seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the unsuitable division of the books, I could not know how to excuse, had I not been directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great art in the dividing evenly of those things, which are subject to number and measure. For the rest, it suits well enough with a great many books of this age, which speak too much, and yet say little ; Ipsi nobis furto subducimur. We are stolen away from our selves, setting a high price on all that is our own. But hereof, though a late good writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on me, because I believe as he doth ; that who so thinks himself the wisest man, is but a poor and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war against all the vanities and fooleries of the world, do always keep the strongest guards against themselves, to defend themselves from themselves, from self-love, self-estimation, and self-opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the work, I have only taken counsel from the argument. For of the Assyrians, which, after the downfall of Babel, take up the first part, and were the first great kings of the world, there came little to the view of posterity : some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrews, of all before the Olympiads, that overcame the consuming disease of time ; and preserved it self, from the very cradle and beginning to this day : and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many scriptures we are referred) are no-where found. The fragments of other stories, with the actions of those kings and princes which shot up here and there in the same time, I am driven to relate by way of digression : of which we may say with Virgil,

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto.

To the same first ages do belong the report of many inventions therein found, and from them derived to us ; though most of the authors names have perished in so long a navigation. For those ages had their laws ; they had diversity of government ; they had kingly rule ; nobility, policy in war ; navigation ; and all, or the most of needful trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a general history we should have left a great deal of nakedness by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I have also made many others ; which, if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heap of human error. For, seeing we digress in all the ways of our lives, yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression ; I may the better be excused, in writing their lives and actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the laws of history, and of the kinds.

The same hath been taught by many ; but by no man better, and with greater brevity, than by that excellent learned gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian laws are also taught us by the prophets and apostles, and every day preach'd unto us. But we still make large digressions ; yea, the teachers themselves do not (in all) keep the path which they point out to others.

For the rest ; after such time as the Persians had wrested the empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great monarchy, producing actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found, it was agreeable to the order of story to attend this empire ; whilst it so flourished, that the affairs of the nations adjoining had reference thereunto. The like observance was to be used towards the fortunes of Greece, when they again began to get ground upon the Persians, as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other nations, who resisted the beginnings of the former empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their several beginnings, in such times and places, as they in their flourishing estates opposed those monarchies; which, in the end, swallowed them up. And herein I have followed the best geographers, who seldom give names to those small brooks, whereof many, joined together, make great rivers; till such time as they become united, and run in a main stream to the ocean sea. If the phrase be weak, and the stile not every way like it self; the first shews their legitimation and true parent; the second will excuse it self upon the variety of matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili avena, used stronger pipes when he sounded the wars of Æneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I use divers Hebrew words in my first book, and elsewhere; in which language others may think, and I my self acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant; but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus; others in Latin character in S. Senensis, and of the rest I have borrowed the interpretation of some of my learned friends. But say I had been beholden to neither, yet were it not to be wonder'd at, having had eleven years leisure to attain the knowledge of that, or of any other tongue: howsoever, I know that it will be said by many, that I might have been more pleasing to the reader, if I had written the story of mine own times; having been permitted to draw water as near the well-head as another. To this I answer, that whosoever, in writing a modern history, shall follow truth too near the heels, it may happily strike out his teeth. There is no mistress or guide, that hath led her followers and servants into greater miseries. He that goes after her too far off, loseth her sight, and loseth himself; and he that walks after her at a middle distance, I know not whether I should call that kind of course temper or baseness. It is true, that I never travelled after mens opinions, when I might have made the best use of them; and I have now too few days remaining, to imitate those, that, either out of extreme ambition, or extreme cowardice, or both, do yet (when death hath them on his shoulders) flatter the world, between the bed and the grave. It is enough for me (being in that state I am) to write of the eldest times; wherein also, why may it not be said, that, in speaking of the pass'd, I point at the present, and tax the vices of those that are yet living, in their persons that are long since dead; and have it laid to my charge. But this I cannot help, though innocent. And certainly if there be any, that, finding themselves spotted like the tigers of old time, shall find fault with me for painting them over a-new, they shall therein accuse themselves justly, and me falsely.

For I protest before the majesty of God, that I malice no man under the sun. Impossible I know it is to please all, seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions; but that they seem divers persons in one and the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Unus mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego non multis, sed tibi; or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient philosopher, Satis est unus, satis est nullus. For it was for the service of that inestimable prince Henry, the successive hope, and one of the greatest of the christian world, that I undertook this work. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amiss. It is now left to the world without a master; from which all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks. Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic exitus est omnis judicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will judge charitably, so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present adversity hath disarmed me. I am on the ground already; and therefore have not far to fall; and for rising again, as in the natural privation, there is no recession to habit; so it is seldom seen in the privation politic. I do therefore forbear to stile my readers gentle, courteous, and friendly, thereby to beg their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done, may be thought enough, and too much, and it is certain, let us claw the reader with never so many courteous phrases, yet shall we evermore be thought fools, that write foolishly. For conclusion; all the hope I have lies in this, that I have already found more ungentle and uncourteous readers of my love towards them, and well-deserving of them, than ever I shall do again. For had it been otherwise, I should hardly have had this leisure to have made my self a fool in print.

The CONTENTS

CHAP. II.

Of man's estate in his first creation: and of God's rest.

Sect. I.
OF the image of God, according to which man was first created.* 15

Sect. II.
Of the intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by sin. 17

Sect. III.
Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal soul. 18

Sect. IV.
Of the spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his creation. 19

Sect. V.
That man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortality. ib.

Sect. VI.
Of the free power, which man had in his first creation to dispose of himself. 20

Sect. VII.
Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the universal created was exceeding good. 21

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradise.

Sect. I.
THAT the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should err.* 21

Sect. II.
A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise. 22

Sect. III.
That there was a true local Paradise, eastward, in the country of Eden. ib.

Sect. IV.
Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise. 24

Sect. V.
That the flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused hills in the earth. 25

Sect. VI.
That Paradise was not the whole earth, as some have thought, making the ocean to be the fountain of those four rivers. 26

Sect. VII.
Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle region of the air. 27

Sect. VIII.
Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those climates. 28

Sect. IX.
Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Coelesyria, there is a country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Isaiah 57. and Ezek. 27. 28

Sect. X.
Of divers other testimonies of the land of Eden: and that this is the Eden of Paradise. 31

Sect. XI.
Of the difficulty in the text, which seemeth to make the four rivers to rise from one stream. 33

Sect. XII.
Of the strange fertility and happiness of the Babylonian soil, as it is certain that Eden was such. 34

Sect. XIII.
Of the river Pison, and the land of Havilah. 35

Sect. XIV.
Of the river Gehon, and the land of Cush: and of the ill translating of Æthiopia for Cush, 2 Chron. xxi. 16. 36

Sect. XV.
A conclusion, by way of repetition of some things spoken of before. 39

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chief trees in the garden of Paradise.

Sect. I.
THAT the tree of life was a material tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man, by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subject to death.* 40

Sect. II.
Of Bezanus's opinion, that the tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica. ib.

Sect. III.
Of Bezanus's not unwittily allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica. 41

Sect. IV.
Of the name of the tree of knowledge of good and evil: with some other notes touching the story of Adam's sin. 42

of the FIRST BOOK.

CHAP. V.

Of divers memorable things between the fall of Adam, and the flood of Noah.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the reliicks of truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in fables and old legends.

The second argument ; that the eastern people were more ancient in populosity, and in all human glory.	67	An answer to an objection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia : and the height of the hills there.	71
†. V.		†. XI.
The third argument ; from the wonderful resistance which Semiramis found in the East Indies.	ib.	Of Caucasus, and divers far higher hills than the Armenian.	72
†. VI.		†. XII.
The fourth argument ; from divers considerations in the person of Noah.	68	Of divers incongruities, if in this story we should take Ararat for Armenia.	ib.
†. VII.		†. XIII.
Of the senseless opinion of Annius the commentator upon Berosus, that the ark rested upon Montes Caspii in Armenia ; and yet upon Gordæi, which are 300 miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.	69	Of the contrary situation of Armenia to the place noted in the text : and that it was no marvel, that the same ledge of hills running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all along, and even in India be called Ararat.	ib.
†. VIII.		†. XIV.
The fifth argument ; the vine must grow naturally near the place where the ark rested.	70	Of the best vine naturally growing on the south-side of the mountains Caucas, and towards the East-Indies : and of other excellencies of the soil.	73

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first plantiag of nations after the flood : and of the sons of Noah ; Shem, Ham, and Japhet, by whom the earth was repopled.

Sect. I.		†. I.
W Hether Shem and Ham were elder than Japhet.	74	O F Josephus's tale of an Ethiopels wife to Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seat of Chush.	85
Sect. II.		†. II.
Of divers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world ; as that all histories must yield to Moses : that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction : and that the known great lords of the first ages, were of the issue of Ham.	75	A dispute against the tale of Josephus.	86
Sect. III.		†. III.
Of the isles of the Gentiles in Japhet's portion : of Berosus's too speedy seating Gomer the son of Japhet in Italy ; and another of Japhet's sons Tubal in Spain : and of the antiquity of longinque navigation.	76	Chush ill expounded for Ethiopia, Ezekiel xxix.	87
Sect. IV.		†. IV.
Of Gog and Magog, Tubal and Melech, seated first about Asia the less, out of Ezekiel xxxviii. 39.	78	Another place of Ezekiel xxx. 9. in the like manner mistaken.	ib.
Sect. V.		†. V.
Against the fabulous Berosus's fiction, that the Italian Janus was Noah.	80	A place, Isaiah xviii. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Ethiopia.	ib.
Sect. VI.		†. VI.
That Gomer also and his son Togorma, of the posterity of Japhet, were first seated about Asia the less : and that from thence they spread westward into Europe ; and northward into Sarmatia.	81	That upon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the story of Sennacherib, and Zera in the story of Asa, are unadvisedly made Ethiopians.	88
Sect. VII.		†. VII.
Of Javan the fourth son of Japhet ; and of Melech, of Aram, and Melech of Japhet.	82	A farther exposition of the place, Isaiah xviii. 1.	ib.
Sect. VIII.		Sect. IX.
Of Atanez and Riphath, the two elder sons of Gomer.	83	Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.	89
Sect. IX.		†. I.
Of the four sons of Javan : and of the double signification of Charlis, either for a proper name, or for the sea.	84	T Hat Mizraim the chief planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sons of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.	ib.
Sect. X.		†. II.
That the seat of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Ethiopia : and of strange fables, and ill translations of scripture, grounded upon the mistaking of this point.	85	Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be known : and of the Egyptians lunar years, which made their antiquities seem the more fabulous.	ib.
		†. III.
		Of certain vain assertions of the antiquities of the Egyptians.	ib.
		†. IV.
		Against Pererius ; that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred years after the creation ; at least that both it, and the most part of the world, were peopled before the flood.	90
		†. V.
		Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.	91
		†. VI.
		Of the words of Moses, Gen. x. ult. concerning Pererius grounded by opinion.	ib.

The CONTENTS

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to have been the chief author of Magic arts: and of divers kinds of Magic

Sect. I.

THAT Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first inventor of astrology, or of magic: and that there were divers great magicians of this name. 113

Sect. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently far diverse from conjuring and witchcraft. 114

Sect. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient magic is not to be condemned; tho' the devil here, as in other kinds, hath sought to obtrude evil things under the name and colour of good things. 116

Sect. IV.

That Daniel's misliking Nabuchodonosor's con- demning of the magicians, doth not justify all the practices. 11

Sect. V.

The abuse of things, which may be found in a kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them. 11

Sect. VI.

Of the divers kinds of unlawful magic. 11

Sect. VII.

Of divers ways by which the devil seemeth to work his wonders. 119

Sect. VIII.

That none was ever raised from the dead by the power of the devil: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul. 120

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

Sect. I.

OF the magnificent building of Nineveh by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis. 121

Sect. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis's reign. 121

Sect. III.

Of Semiramis's parentage, and education: and metamorphosis of her mother. 121

Sect. IV.

Of her expedition into India, and death after discomfiture: with a note of the improbability of her vices. 122

Sect. V.

Of the temple of Belus, built by Semiramis: and of the pyramids of Egypt. 122

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the Second Book of the First Part of the HISTORY of the WORLD.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the use of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian empire.

Sect. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a brief translation to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham. 123

Sect. II.

A proposal of reasons or arguments, that are brought to prove Abraham was born in the year 292 after the flood, and not in the year 352. 124

Sect. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his father's death. 124

Sect. IV.

The answer to another of the objections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth year. 126

Sect. V.

The answer to two more of the objections, shewing that we may have certainty of Abraham's age from the scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest son: and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brothers should be respected. 126

Sect. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. xi. 26. doth not prove that he was the eldest: together with divers reasons, proving that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah. 127

Sect. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more improbable. 128

Sect. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded upon the times noted in the story of Abraham. 129

Sect. IX.

That Amraphel, one of the four kings whom Abraham overthrew, Gen. xiv. may probably be thought to have been Ninias the son of Ninus. 130

Sect. X.

Of Arioch, another of the four Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to have been king, lay between Coele Syria, and Arabia Petraea. 130

Sect. XI.

Of Tidal, another of the four kings. 131

Sect. XII.

of the FIRST BOOK

Sect. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chief of the four kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian empire at this time was much impaired. 131

Sect. XIII.

That it was not improbable, that the four kings had no dominion in the countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their colonies planted themselves, and so retained the names of the countries whence they came: which if it be so, we need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble ourselves with many other difficulties. 132

CHAP. II.

Of the kings of Egypt from the first peopling of it after the flood, to the time of the delivery of the Israelites from thence.

Sect. I.

A Brief of the names and times of the first kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points. 134

Sect. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Cham's reign in Egypt began in the year after the flood 191. ib.

Sect. III.

That these Dynasties were not divers families of kings, but rather successions of regents; oft-times many under one king. 135

Sect. IV.

Of Cham, and his son Mizraim, or Osiris. ib.

Sect. V.

Of the time when Osiris's reign ended: and that

Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus, the son of Osiris. 136

Sect. VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Egyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostris, successively reigning after Mizraim, and of divers errors about the former Sesostris. 137

Sect. VII.

Of Busris, the first oppressor of the Israelites: and of his successor queen Thermutis, that took up Moses out of the water. 138

Sect. VIII.

Of the two brethren of queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was born: and who it was that perished in the Red sea. 139

CHAP. III.

Of the delivery of Israel out of Egypt.

Sect. I.

O f the time of Moses's birth: and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt. 139

Sect. II.

Of divers cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this story, or elsewhere in the scripture. 140

Sect. III.

Of the cruelty against the Israelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses's preservation and education. 141

Sect. IV.

Of Moses's flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certain ancient historians; of his war in Ethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo's judgment of his pastoral life: and that of Pererius of the Books of Genesis, and Job. 142

Sect. V.

Of Pharaoh's pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red sea, so far as Succoth. 143

Sect. VI.

Of the solary and lunar years: and how they are reconciled: with the form of the Hebrew year, and their manner of intercalation. 144

Sect. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red sea: and of the divers ways leading out of Egypt. 146

Sect. VIII.

Of their passage over the Red sea: and of the Red sea it self. ib.

Sect. IX.

That the passage through the Red sea was miraculous; and not at a low ebb. 148

CHAP. IV.

Of the journeying of the Israelites from the Red sea, to the place where the law was given them: with a discourse of laws.

Sect. I.

A Transition, by way of recapitulation of some things touching chronology: with a continuance of the story until the Amalekites met with the Israelites. 149

Sect. II.

Of the Amalekites, Midianites, and Kenites, upon occasion of the battle with the Amalekites, and Jethro's coming, who being a Kenite, was priest of Midian. 150

Sect. III.

Of the time when the law was given: with divers commendations of the invention of laws 151

Sect. IV.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right. ib.

Sect. V.

Of the definition of laws, and the law eternal. 152

Sect. VI.

Of the law of Nature. 154

Sect. VII.

Of the written law of God. 156

Sect. VIII.

Of the unwritten law of God, given to the patriarchs by tradition. ib.

Sect. IX.

Of the moral, judicial, and ceremonial law: with a note prefixed, how the scripture speaketh not always in one sense, when it nameth the law of Moses. 157

Sect. X.

Diffension between the two Roman consuls. Whether it be likely that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battel at Cannæ.

621

Sect. IX.

Of things following the battel at Cannæ.

Sect. X.

Of the great supply that was decreed at Carthage, to be sent to Hannibal in Italy. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman historians, how partial they were in their writings.

Sect. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the son of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italy.

635

Sect. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the city of Rome. Posthumius the Roman general, with his whole army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip king of Macedon enters into a league with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans, joyning with the Etolians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him; the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

642

Sect. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their strength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick necessities of their common-weal.

647

Sect. XIV.

The Romans win some towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

650

Sect. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicily, held war against the Romans in those islands; and were overcome.

657

Sect. XVI.

How the war passed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory at Metaurus.

666

Sect. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman, made entire conquest of Spain.

675

Sect. XXI.

Hannibal in Afric prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vain; loseth a battel at Nadagara; and perswades the Carthaginians to sue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.
695

C H A P. IV.

Of Philip the father of Perseus, king of Macedon; his first acts and war with the Romans, by whom he was subdued.

Sect. I.

HOW the Romans grew acquainted in the east countries, and desirous of war there. The beginning of many princes, with great wars, at one time. The Etolians over-run Peloponnesus. Philip and his associates make war against the Etolians. Alteration of the state in Sparta. The Etolians invade Greece and Macedon; and are invaded at home by Philip.
702

Sect. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill counsellors, who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were justly punished. He invadeth the Etolians a second time, and forceth them to sue for peace, which is granted unto them.
706

Sect. III.

Philip, at the perswasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into league with Hannibal against the Romans. The tenor of the league between Hannibal and Philip.
715

Sect. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize upon the free states his associates, with the troubles into which he thereby fell, whilst he bore a part in the second Punic war. He poisoneth Aratus, and grows hateful to the Achæans.
716

Sect. V.

Of Philopœmen, general of the Achæans, and Machanidas tyrant of Lacedemon. A battel between them, wherein Machanidas is slain
718

Sect. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia; and their lineages. Of the Galatians.
719

Sect. VII.

The town of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, king of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks, and is warred upon by Attalus, king of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.
720

Sect. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian war, seek matter of quarrel against Philip. The Athenians, upon slight cause, proclaim war against Philip; moved thereto by Attalus, whom they flatter. Philip wins divers towns, and makes peremptory answer to the Roman ambassador. The furious resolution of the Achaemen.
721

Sect. IX.

The Romans decree war against Philip, and send one of their consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time, both in quality and estate
723

Sect. X.

The town of Chalcis in Eubœa, taken and sack'd by the Romans and their associates, that lay in garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprise; wasteth the country about, and makes a journey into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis, the tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. Philip offers to make war against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoileth again; and provides against his enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers princes join with them. Great labouring to draw the Etolians into the war.
ib.

Sect. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Etolians invade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman fleet.
726

Sect. XII.

Villius, the Roman consul, wastes a year to no effect. War of the Gauls in Italy. An embassy of the Romans to Carthage, Masaniissa and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his kingdom, and T. Quintius Flaminius is sent against him.
727

Sect. XIII.

The Romans begin to make war by negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans and Etolians. The Achæans, forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the tyrant, who presently enters into league with the Romans.
728

Sect. XIV.

The battel at Cynoscephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.
733

Sect. XV.

T. Quintius falls out with the Etolians, and granteth truce unto Philip, with conditions, upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.
734 # of the F I F T H B O O K.

C H A P. V.

The wars of the Romans with Antiochus the great, and his adherents.

Sect. I.

WHAT kings, of the races of Seleucus and Ptolemy, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the great. 737

Sect. II.

The beginning of the great Antiochus's reign. Of Ptolemy Euergetes and Philopator, kings of Egypt. War between Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo; and expedition of Antiochus against him. The re-continuance of Antiochus's Egyptian war: with the passages between the two kings: the victory of Ptolemy; and peace concluded. Of Achæus and his rebellion; his greatness, and his fall. Antiochus's expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the king's reigning in India, after the death of the great Alexander. 739

Sect. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolemy Philopator in Egypt: with the tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolemy Epiphanes, the son of Philopator. His irresolution, in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. He seeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him, intending nevertheless to have war with him. His doings about the Hellespont; which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrel to him. 745

Sect. IV.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their war with Philip: after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans. His flight unto the king Antiochus. The Etolians murmur against the Romans in Greece. The war of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius's triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans. 748

Sect. V.

Of the long wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Injuries done by Masaniſſa to the Carthaginians; they sue to the Romans for justice in vain. 755

Sect. VI.

The Etolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to war upon the Romans; by whom they hold themselves wronged and disgraced. Nabis besiegeth Gyttheum, and wasteth some part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquisheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace by the Romans, joins with the Eto- lians. The Etolians surprize Demetrius; and, by killing Nabis their confederate, seize upon Sparta: But they are driven out by the citizens; who at Philopœmen's persuasions annex themselves to the Achæans. 757

Sect. VII.

Antiochus, persuaded by Thoas the Etolian, comes over into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages between him, the Etolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the king's ambassadors, and the Etolians: with the civil answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired peace, between the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their own liberty. Of many petty estates that fell to the king. Of Amnander: and an idle vanity, by which king Philip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsel in vain. Some towns won in Theſſaly. The king retires to Chalcis: where he marrieth a young wife, and revels away the rest of the winter. Upon the coming of the Roman consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Etolians keeps the ſircights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leaving all in Greece unto the victors. 761

Sect. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African's elder brother, for his lieutenant, is sent into Greece. He grants long truce to the Etolians, that so he might at leisure pass into Asia. Much troublesome business by sea: and divers fights. An invasion upon Eumenes's kingdom: with the siege of Pergamus raised by an handful of the Achæans. L. Scipio the consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battel of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus, being vanquished, yieldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans used their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is surnamed, The Asiatic, as his brother was styled the African. 768

Sect. IX.

The Etolians, and the Gallo-greeks, vanquished by the Roman consuls Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have passed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyl's prophecies: the books of Hermes: and that inscription SIMONI DEO SANCTO. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's; and that beginning of faction among the Roman nobility. 773

C H A P. VI.

The second Macedonian war.

Sect. I.

THE condition wherein those princes and estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the war with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being unready for war, obtains peace at Rome by his son Demetrius; of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous. 778

Sect. II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the military profession is of all other the most unhappy: notwithstanding some examples, which may seem to prove the contrary. 780

Sect. III.

Philip making provision for war against the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own subjects. His negotiation with the Bastarnæ. His cruelty. He suspecteth his son Demetrius. Demetrius accused by his brother Perseus; and shortly after slain, by his father's appointment. Philip repenteth him of his son's death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perseus, he dieth. 783

Sect. IV.

How the Bastarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perseus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they suffered Masaniſſa, cruelly to oppress the Carthaginians. They quarrel with Perseus. They allow not their confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The treason of Callicrates; whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perseus. He seeks friendship of the Achæans, and is withstood by Callicrates. The Romans discover their intent of warring upon him. 786

Sect. V.

How Eumenes king of Pergamus was abused, with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman senate. The senate honours him greatly, and contemns his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The unusual stoutness of the Macedonian ambassadors. Perseus's attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus's device to poison some of the Roman senators: whereupon they decree war against him, and send him defiance. Other things concerning the justice of this war. 791

Sect. VI.

The Romans solicit the Greeks to join with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timorousness of Perseus. Marcus a Roman ambassador deludes him with hopes of peace. His forces. He takes the field; and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this war.

Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what advantages the Macedonian had or might have had, but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his victory, sues for peace, and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus, having the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the country lying without Tempe. The Bœotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman commanders unfortunate in the war against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their friends; for whose ease the senate makes provision; having heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders. 794

Sect. VII.

Q. Martius the Roman consul, with extream difficulty and danger, enters into Tempe. The cowardise of Perseus in abandoning Tempe. The town of Diium quitted by Martius, repaired and fortified by the king. The Romans attempt many places, with ill success. Their affairs in hard estate. Martius a cunning and a bad man. Polybius sent ambassador to Martius from the Achæans. Polybius's honest wisdom beneficial to the Achæans. King Eumenes grows averse from the Romans. Perseus negotiates with Antiochus and Eumenes. His false dealing with Gentius king of Illyria, whom he draws into the Roman war. He sends ambassadors to the Rhodians, who vainly take upon them to be arbitrators between him and the Romans. Perseus loseth a mighty succour of the Bastarnæ, by his wretched parsimony. 799

Sect. VIII.

Of L. Æmylius Paulus, the consul. His journey. He forceth Perseus to discamp. He will not hazard battel with any disadvantage. Of an eclipse of the moon. Æmylius's superstition. The battel of Pydna. SECT. I.

That the INVISIBLE GOD is seen in his Creatures.

GOD, whom the wisest men acknowledge to be a Power uneffable, and Virtue infinite; a Light by abundant clarity invisible; an Understanding which itself can only comprehend, an Essence eternal and spiritual, of absolute pureness and simplicity; was, and is pleased to make himself known by the work of the world: In the wonderful magnitude whereof (all which he embraceth, filleth, and sustaineth) we behold the Image of that Glory which cannot be measured, and withal, that one, and yet universal Nature, which cannot be divided. In the glorious lights of heaven, we perceive a Shadow of his Divine Countenance; in his merciful provision for all that live, his manifold Goodness; and lastly, in creating and making existent the world universal, by the absolute art of his own word, his Power and Almightyness; which Power, Light, Virtue, Wisdom, and Goodness, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern per speculum creaturarum, that is, in the disposition, order, and variety of celestial and terrestrial bodies: terrestrial, in their strange and manifold diversities; celestial, in their beauty and magnitude; which in their continual and contrary motions, are neither repugnant, intermix'd, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the knowledge of the omnipotent Cause, and by these motions, their almighty Mover.

In these more than wonderful works, God (saith <sup>a</sup> Hugo) speaketh unto man: And it is true, that these be those discourses of God, whose effects, all that live, witness in themselves; the sensible, in their sensible natures; the reasonable, in their reasonable souls: For, according to <sup>b</sup> St. Gregory,

Omnis. hanc et ipsa quod rationalis conditus est, ex ipsa ratione, illum qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he, which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Joh) which is, according to the fathers, Dominationem illius conspiciere in creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his creature. That God hath been otherwise seen, to wit, with corporal eyes, exceedeth the small proportion of my understanding, grounded on these places of <sup>a</sup>St. John and <sup>a</sup>St. Paul, Ye have not heard his voice at any time, neither have ye seen his shape. And again, Whom never man saw, nor can see.

And this I am sure agrees with the nature of God's simplicity, of which St. Augustine, Ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet alio nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were <sup>b</sup>Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzene, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Evaristus, Alcuinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his own word, and by this visible world, is God perceived of men; which is also the understood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his creatures, whose hieroglyphical characters are the unnumbered stars, the sun and moon; written on these large volumes of the firmament; written also on the earth and the seas, by the letters of all those living creatures, and plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned <sup>c</sup>Cusanus, Mundus universus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The world universal is nothing else but God express'd. As the invisible things of God (saith <sup>d</sup>St. Paul) are seen by the creation of the world, being considered in his creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding than his own will, no other matter than his own power, no other workman than his own word, no other consideration than his own infinite goodness. The example and pattern of these his creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternity in the abundance of his own love, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his unchanged will moved, by his high wisdom disposed, and by his almighty power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to love God, ex fide, & ex effectibus (that is) both persuaded by his word, and by the effects of the world's creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, quae factae sunt, quaeque sunt & gubernantur, observatione & collatione; vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he, of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be known by any knowledge of cause or beginning (saith <sup>e</sup>Montanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and govern; or else by the word of God himself.

SECT. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the world to have been created by God.

THIS work and creation of the world, did most of the ancient and learned philosophers acknowledge, though by divers terms, and in a different manner express'd; I mean all those who are intitled by St. Augustine, summi philosophi, philosophers of highest judgment and understanding. <sup>f</sup>Morcurius Trismegistus calleth God, principium universorum, the original of the universal; to whom he giveth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Aeternitas, Necessitas, Finis, & Renovatio. And wherein he truly with St. Paul casteth upon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by God's almighty word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus, fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) took the word Fire to express God by (as in <sup>g</sup>Deuteronomy and in <sup>h</sup>St. Paul it is used) Omnia ex uno igne genita sunt, All things (saith he) are caused or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the will of the most high God: whose remarkable words are thus converted; <sup>i</sup>Cum abscondisset omnia Jupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceive this sense: When great Jupiter had bidden all things in himself, working out of the love of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth, into grateful light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most high, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Unus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. Plato calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the universal; <sup>j</sup>Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiosity of some men have found it superfluous to remember the opinions of philosophers in matters of divinity (it being true, that the scripture hath not want of any foreign testimony) yet as the fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so St. Paul himself did not despise, but thought it lawful and profitable, to remember whatsoever he found agreeable to the word of God among the heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendring vengeance to them that know him not, as in the epistle to Titus he citeth Epimenides against the Cretans, and to the Corinthians, Menander; and in the seventeenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. For, truth (saith St. Ambrose) by whomsoever uttered, is of the Holy Ghost; Veritas, à quo-cunque dicatur, à Spiritu Sancto est: And lastly, let those kind of men learn this rule; Quae sacris serviunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane, that serveth to the use of holy things.

SECT. III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes. I. 1.

THIS visible world, of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all; in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrews seek some hidden mystery, and which in the Jews Targum is converted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men have conceived, both which are subsequent; but only to creation then. For before that beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor form to inform, nor any being, but the eternal. Nature was not, nor the next parent or time begotten, time properly and naturally taken: for if God had but disposed of matter already in being; then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of matter proceeded from a greater power; than that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an one (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency; for it is an act of more excellency to make, than to dispose of things made? Whereupon it may be concluded, that matter could not be before this beginning; except we feign a double creation, or allow of two powers, and both infinite; the impossibility whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile est plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot be more infinites than one: for one of them would limit the other.

S E C T. IV.

Of the meaning of the words Heaven and Earth, Genes. ii. 1.

THE universal matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth under the names of Heaven and Earth) is by divers diversly understood; for there are that conceive, that by those words was meant the first matter, as the Peripateticks understand it; to which St. Augustine and Isidore seem to adhere, Fecisti mundum (saith St. Augustine) de materia informi; quam fecisti de nulla re, pene nullam rem: that is, Thou hast made the world of a matter without form; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other than nothing.

But this potential and imaginary materia prima, cannot exist without form. Peter Lombard, the Schoolmen, Beda, Lyranus, Comestor, Tostatus, and others affirm, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heaven; which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heaven Steuchius Eugubinus calleth Divine clarity and uncreated: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Pererius, though (as I conceive) he rather failed in the subsequent, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, and just Souls, than in the former affirmation; for of the first, That God liveth in eternal light, it is written, My soul, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himself with light: and in the Revelation, And the city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also John Mercer upon Genesis differeth not in opinion from Eugubinus: for as by Heaven created in the beginning, was not meant the invisible or supercelestial; so in his judgment, because it was in all eternity the glorious seat of God himself, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum super-cælestem meo iudicio creari (saith Mercer) non erat necesse.

But as Moses forbore to speak of Angels, and of things invisible and incorporate, for the weakness of their capacities, whom he then cared to inform of those things which were most manifest (to wit) That God did not only by a strong hand deliver them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their fore-fathers; but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable universal: so on the other side I dare not think, that any supercelestial heaven, or whatsoever else (not himself) was increate and eternal, and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortal men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seat of infinite power, no more than infinite power itself can be limited: for his place is in himself, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possession! it is great, and hath no end; it is high, and unmeasurable.

But leaving multiplicity of opinions, it is more probable and allowed, that by the words Heaven and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, as well of all the heavens, and orbs supernal, as of the globe of the earth and waters; which covered it over (to wit) that very matter of all things, Materia, chaos, possibilitas, sive posse fieri. Which matter (saith Calvin) was so called, Quod totius mundi semen fuerit; Because it was the seed of the universal: an opinion of ancient philosophers long before.

S E C T. V.

That the substance of the waters, as mix'd in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word earth: and that the earth, by the attributes of unformed and void, is described as the chaos of the ancient heathen.

M O S E S first nameth heaven and earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart, when God by his spirit began to distinguish the confused mass, and (as Basil saith) Preparare naturam aque ad fecunditatem vitalem; To prepare the nature of water to a vital fruitfulness.

For under the word Heaven, was the matter of all heavenly bodies, and natures express'd: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is under the moon, and subject to alteration. Corrupt seeds bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure heavens are not subject, though subject to perishing. They shall perish (saith David) and the heavens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of earth; for it is written, Let the waters under the heavens be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear: which proveth, that the dry land was mix'd and covered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seed of the earth, much less of the universal. Initio tu, Domine, terram fundasti; Thou, O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the earth: and again, The earth was covered with the deep (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith David. And if by natural arguments it may be proved, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth us also, that earth rarified may become water: water, air: air, fire: and so on the contrary. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam convertit; God turneth the substance of fire by air into water. For the heavens and the earth remained in the same state in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicity of perfection, in respect of beauty and ornament. Cælum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrews call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latin translation simply, and as specific water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero aquas fecit; For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor (that is, of divers natures) and this name or word the Latins, wanting a voice to express it, call it in the plural, aquas, waters.

This mass, or indigested matter, or chaos, created in the beginning, was without form, that is, without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired, when the spirit of God had separated the earth, and digested it from the waters. And the earth was void, that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that form, which it now retaineth; then did the earth bud forth the herb, which seedeth seed, and the fruitful tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not given to the earth, while it was confus'd; nor to the heavens, before they had motion, and adornment. God saw that it was good, that is, made perfect: for perfection is that to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera; The works of the perfect God are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect matter had the ancient poets their invention of Demogorgon; Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that chaos: of which Ovid;

*Ante Mare, & Terras, & (quod tegit omnia) cælum, Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe,
Quem dixere chaos, rudis indigestaque moles.*

Before the sea and land was made, and heaven, that all doth hide,

In all the world one only face of nature did abide:
Which chaos hight, a huge rude heap.

SECT. VI.

How it is to be understood, that the spirit of God moved upon the waters; and that this is not to be searched curiously.

AFTER the creation of heaven and earth, then void and without form, the spirit of God moved upon the waters. The seventy interpreters use the word superferebatur, moved upon or over: incubabat or fovebat, (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cujusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil): which words incubare or fovere, importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, have a special likeness. Verbum translatus est ab avibus pullitiei suæ incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & plane innarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spiritual and unexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrews convert it to this effect, spiritus Dei volitabat; The spirit of God did flutter: the Chaldean paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei sufflabat: or, as others understand the Chaldean, Flabat, pellebat, removebat: The wind from the face of God did blow under, drive, or remove, or did blow upon; according to the 147th Psalms, He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increase: but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arias Montanus in these words, Et spiritus Elohim Merachefet, id est, efficaciter motitans, consovens, ac agitans super facies gemini liquoris; The spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring upon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh four originals, whereof three are agents, and the last passive and material, to wit, Causa, which is the divine goodness: 1. Jehi, which is, fiat, sive erit, let it be, or, it shall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima prolata fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, spiritus elo-

him, the spirit of God, id est, Vis quædam divina, agilis ac præsens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens; that is, a certain divine power, or strength, every where active and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Maim, id est, Materies ad omnem rem faciendam habilis; Matter apt to become every thing. For my self, I am resolved (Cum Deus sit superrationale omniratione; Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderful ways of working, may in a measure be perceived by man's understanding, yet the manner and first operation of his divine power, cannot be conceived by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortal body. Animalis homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways. And as the world hath not known God himself; so are his ways (according to St. Paul) past finding out. O righteous father, the world hath not known thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitality, and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is only known to God. Quomodo in omnibus sit rebus, vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For how God (saith St. Augustine, speaking of his ubiquity) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our understanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemque distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius Majestatis æternæ, cogitatio assequeretur humana; There would be no difference between God and man, if man's understanding could conceive the counsels and disposing of that eternal majesty; and therefore to be over-curious in searching how the all-powerful word of God wrought in the creation of the world, or his all-piercing and operative Spirit distinguishing, gave form to the matter of the universal, is a labour and search like unto his, who, not contented with a known and safe ford, will presume to pass over the greatest river in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his understanding. We behold the sun, and enjoy his light, as long as we look towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warm ourselves safely, while we stand near the fire; but if we seek to out-face the one, or enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to eschew curiosity; this is true, that the English word (moved) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with Mirandula, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause, St. Augustine sometimes taketh for the Holy Ghost; sometimes for a wind or breath, Sub nomine spiritus, Under the name of a spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for Virtualis creatura, for a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum tennem intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible spirit: Anaxagoras, Mentem: Tostatus, Voluntatem & mentem Dei, The will and mind of God; which Aiens, Plato in Timæo maketh Animam mundi, The soul of the world: and in his sixth book, De Republica, he calleth it, The law of heaven; in his epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Mens deficit, vox filii, & non mea tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My mind faileth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but even the voice of angels : so may all men else say in the understanding and utterance of the ways and works of the creation ; for to him (saith <sup>a</sup> Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another by which he can, Sed consubstantiale illi est, quicquid ejus est, & quicquid est ; Whatsoever attribute of him there is, and whatsoever he is, it is the very same substance that himself is.

But the spirit of God which moved upon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite active power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustaineth and giveth continuance to the universal. For the spirit of the Lord filleth all the world ; and the same is it which maintaineth all things, saith <sup>b</sup> Solomon. If thou send forth thy spirit (saith David) they are created : and Gregory, Deus suo presentiali esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum defluerent universa : God giveth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himself from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would again fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of God's spirit in all things, <sup>c</sup> Virgil hath express'd excellently :

*Principio cælum ac terras, camposque liquentes, Lucentemque globum lunæ, Titaniaque astra, Spiritus intus alit : totamque infusa per artus,
Mens agitat molem, & magno se corpore miscet.*

The heaven, the earth, and all the liquid main,
The moon's bright globe, and stars Titanian,
A spirit within maintains : and their whole mass,
A mind, which through each part infus'd doth pass.
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great body of the universe.

And this was the same spirit, which moved in the universal, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. <sup>d</sup> His spirit hath garnished the heavens, saith Job. So then the Spirit of God moved upon the waters, and created in them their spirituality, and natural motion ; motion brought forth heat ; and heat rarification, and subtilty of parts. By this spirit (which gave heat and motion, and thereby operation to every nature, while it moved upon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and <sup>e</sup> chaos, disposed to all forms alike) was begotten air : an element superior, as lighter than the waters ; thro' whose vast, open, subtile, diaphanick or transparent body, the light, afterwards created, might easily transpierce : light for the excellency thereof being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostom calleth a vital operation, Aquis a Deo vitam, ex qua aque non solum motionem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vital operation given by God unto the waters, whereby the waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth living creatures.

SECT. VII.

Of the light created, as the material substance of the sun, and of the nature of it, and difficulty of knowledge of it : and of the excellency and use of it : and of motion, and heat annexed unto it.

These waters were afterwards congregated, and called the sea : and this light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and united, and called the sun, the organ and instrument of created light.

For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceive) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the sun's creation, and the uniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proved by these words, <sup>f</sup> Let there be lights in the firmament, to separate the day from the night : which lights in the firmament of heaven, were also made for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, days and years are distinguished ; after which succeeded time, or together with which, that time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three days which preceded the sun's creation, or formal perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the fifth verse ; was but such a space, as afterwards by the sun's motion made a civil or natural day. And as waters were the matter of air, of the firmament, and of the lower and upper waters, and of the seas, and creatures therein ; earth, the matter of beasts, plants, minerals, and man's body : so may light (for expression sake) be called the chaos, or material substance of the sun, and other lights of heaven : howbeit, neither the sun, nor any thing sensible, is that light it self, <sup>g</sup> Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (tho' it make it self and all things else visible : ) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the moon, by whom the neighbouring region (which the Greeks call æther, the place of the supposed element of fire) is effected and qualified, and by it all bodies living in this our air. For this light Avicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtutum, & impressionum ; The conductor, and preserver, or nourisher of all celestial virtues and impressions, nothing descending of heavenly influences, but by the medium, or means of light. Aristotle calleth light a quality, inherent or cleaving to a diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens diaphano : but this may be better avouched of the heat, which it transporteth, and bringeth with it, or conducteth : which heat (say the Platonicks) <sup>h</sup> Abeunte lumine residet in subiecto ; The light being departed, doth reside in the subject, as warmth in the air, tho' the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academics make incorporeal, and so doth Montanus, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium ; Which neither hardness resisteth, nor space leaveth.

Aristotle findeth corporality in the beams of light ; but it is but by way of repetition of other mens opinions, saith <sup>i</sup> Picolomineus, Democritus, Leuippus, and Epicurus, give materiality to light it self, but improperly : for it passeth at an instant, from the heaven to the earth ; nor is it resisted by any hardness, because it pierceth thro' the solid body of glass, or other crystalline matter ; and whereas it is withstood by unclean, and unpure earthy substances, less hard, and more easy to invade than the former, the same is, <sup>k</sup> Quod obstaculum natura terreum atque sordidum, non capit candidam luminis puritatem ; Because an obstacle, by nature earthy and foul, doth not receive the pure clearness of light : alluding to that most divine light, which only shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly dross, and human uncleanness.

But of this created light there is no agreement in opinion ; neither do I marvel at it, for it cannot be found either in the fathers, philosophers, school-men, or other ancient or latter writers, that any of them understood either it or themselves therein : all men (to cast off ignorance) have disputed thereof, but there is no man that hath been taught

thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as he hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Lyranus, and others : so is his own judgment herein, as weak as any man's ; and most of the schoolmen were rather curious in the nature of terms, and more subtile in distinguishing upon the parts of doctrine already laid down, than discoverers of any thing hidden, either in philosophy or divinity : of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientiæ odiosius acumine nimio ; Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, than too acute sharpness. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men (which the same time hath brought forth and devoured) resolved us, whether this light be substantial, corporal, or incorporeal : corporal they say it cannot be, because then it could neither pierce the air, nor those hard, solid, and diaphanous bodies, which it doth ; and yet every day we see the air illightned : Incorporeal it cannot be, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the fathers so esteemed. Others say (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no form so excellent as it self to inform it : neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject : for light being taken from the sun, the sun is no more the sun in existence. 2dly, If light were proceeding from matter and form, then either, or both, must be one of these, lucid or bright, dark or opaque, diaphanous or transparent ; but darkness cannot be parent of light, and things diaphanous (being neither light nor darkness, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or form, or both, be lucid and shining. 3dly, Lucid and shining obtain their so being of the light ; and therefore if we derive this being of light from a former, then would the progress go on infinitely and against nature ; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the sun hath his being primarily, and immediately of it self, and is therefore the sun's form, and the form of all lucid and shining bodies : but what is taught hereby, let others judge.

But in my understanding, Lumen (which may be englished by the word shine) is an intentional species of that which may be englished by light ; and so, this shining, which proceedeth from the sun, or other lights of heaven, or from any other light, is an image, or intentional species thereof ; and an intentional species may be understood by the example of a red or green colour, occasioned by the shining of the sun through red or green glass : for then we perceive the same colour cast upon any thing opposite ; which redness or other colour we call the intentional species of the colour in that glass. And again, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet understood, so it is disputed, whether this light first created, be the same which the sun inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the sun's creation.

But by the most wise and unchanged order, which God observed in the works of the world, I gather, that the light, in the first day created, was the substance of the sun : for Moses repeateth twice the main parts of the universal : first, as they were created in matter ; 2dly, As they were adorned with form : first, naming the heavens, the earth, the waters, all confused ; and afterward, the waters congregated, the earth made dry land ; and the heavens distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the earth, as it was earth, before it was uncovered, and before it was called Arida, or dry land ; and the waters were waters, before they were congregated and called the sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their virtual forms : so the sun, although it had not its formal perfection, his circle, beauty, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (under the name of light) created ; and this light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day united, and set in the firmament of heaven : for, to light created in the first day God gave no proper place or fixation ; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation (which was to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this light was congregated and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdom of God find cause why it should move (by which motion, days and nights are distinguished) till then : because there was not yet any creature produced, to which, by moving, the sun might give light, heat, and operation.

But after the earth (distinguished from waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herb, &c. God caused the sun to move, and (by interchange of time) to visit every part of the inferior world ; by his heat to stir up the fire of generation, and to give activity to the seeds of all natures : For, as a king, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that use and end, to which it was ordained ; so it pleased God (saith Procopius) to command the light to be ; which by his all-powerful word he approved, and approving it, disposed thereof to the use and comfort of his future creatures.

But in that it pleased God to ask of Job, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way where light dwelleth ? we thereby know, that the nature thereof falleth not under man's understanding ; and therefore let it suffice, that by God's grace we enjoy the effects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (saith Esdra) and those which inhabit the heavens, do only know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in cælo, nihil notum in terra : Nothing unknown in heaven, nothing perfectly known on earth. Res vere sunt in mundo invisibili ; in mundo visibili umbræ rerum. Things themselves are in the invisible world ; in the world visible, but their shadows. Surely, if this light be not spiritual, yet it approacheth nearest unto spirituality ; and if it have any corporality, then of all other the most subtile and pure ; for howsoever it is of all things seen, the most beautiful, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficial. For it ministrerh unto men, and other creatures, all celestial influences ; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrows, which the darkness both begetteth and maintaineth ; it discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carrieth up with an angelical swiftness, our eyes unto heaven, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel to surmount these perceived heavens, and to find out their omnipotent cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis : Our knowledge doth not quiet it self in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cætera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet ; It is the light (saith St. Ambrose) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it self communiceth its goodness and beauty unto all. Of which Ovid out of Orpheus :

* Lucidum corpus aut plenum luce, aliis tenebris impervium. Opaca sunt plena luce tenebris, alieno lumine. Transparentia autem Diaphana carent luce & lumine & tenebris : aliis & lumine & tenebris permeantur. Scilicet subiecta sunt. Gen. 1. 3. \ Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum, Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Mundi oculus.*

The world discerns it self, while I the world behold,
By me the longest years, and other times are told,
I the world's eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one spark of that eternal fire, or any far-off dawning of God's glorious brightness, the same in the beauty, motion, and virtue of this light, may be perceived. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the light, by Hermes named lux sancta, and Christ our Saviour said to be that light, which lightneth every man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of God's incomprehensible sublimity, and purity, this is also true, that God is neither a mind, nor a spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profecto non mens est, at vero ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith Hermes in Pœmandro) certainly is not a mind, but the cause that the mind hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which every spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the mass and chaos being first created, void, dark, and informed, was by the operative spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the waters having now received spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into air, which God illightned: the earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same divine virtue) brought forth the bud of the herb that seedeth seed, &c. and for a mean and organ, by which this operative virtue might be continued, God appointed the light to be united, and gave it also motion and heat, which heat caused a continuance of those several species, which the earth (being made fruitful by the spirit) produced, and with motion begat the time and times succeeding.

SECT. VIII.

Of the firmament, and of the waters above the firmament: and whether there be any crystalline heaven, or any primum mobile.

After that the spirit of God had moved upon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and evaporation were ascended, and those of the earth and sea.

But these waters, separate above this extension, which the Latin translation calleth firmamentum, or expanse (for so Vatablus, Pagninus, and Junius turn it) are not the crystalline heavens created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Basilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against this fable. For the waters above the firmament, are the waters in the air above us, where the same is more solid and condense, which God separated from the lower waters by a firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia (which Montanus writeth Rakiagh) and Shamajim, being indifferently taken for the heaven and for air, and more properly for the air and æther, than for the heavens, as the best Hebricians understand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infirmis crassis diducta, subjectaque distarent; For that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being severed and cut off from low and gross matters: and the waters above the firmament, express'd in the word Majim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters above the air, or in the uppermost region of the same.

And that the word heaven is used for the air, the scriptures every where witness; as in the blessings of Joseph, and in the 104th Psalms, By these springs shall the fowl of the heaven dwell; and upon Sodom and Gomorrah it rained brimstone and fire out of the heaven; and in Isaac's blessing to Jacob, God give thee therefore of the dew of heaven: and in Deuteronomy the 11th, But the land whither you go to possess it, is a land that drinketh water of the rain of heaven: and in Job, Who hath ingendered the frosts of heaven? and in St. Matthew, Behold the fowls of heaven, for they sow not. So as in all the scriptures of the Old Testament throughout, is the word heaven very oft used for air, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let us build us a tower, whose top may reach to heaven, &c. And in this very place Basil avoucheth, that this appellation of heaven for the firmament, is but by way of similitude: his own words be these; Et vocavit Deus firmamentum cœlum. Hæc appellatio aliquid proprie accommodatur, huic autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament heaven: this appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the starry heaven) but to this (that is, to the firmament dividing the waters) it is imposed by similitude. And if there were no other proof, that by the firmament was meant the air, and not the heaven; the words of Moses in the 8th verse, conferred with the same word firmament in the 20th verse, make it manifest: for in the 8th verse it is written, that God called the firmament, which divided waters from waters, heaven; and in the 20th verse he calleth the firmament of heaven, air; in these words, And let the fowl fly upon earth in the open firmament of heaven. And what use there should be of this icy, or crystalline, or watery heaven, I conceive not, except it be to moderate and temper the heat, which the primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in very truth, instead of this help, it would add an unmeasurable greatness of circle, whereby the swiftness of that first moveable would exceed all possibility of belief. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; But no man ought to be held to impossibilities; and faith it self (which surmounteth the height of all human reason) hath for a forcible conductor the word of truth, which also may be called Lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; The light of all reason and understanding. Now that this supposed first moveable, turneth it self so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the scriptures teach it not) let those that can believe mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many heavens, let the reader that desireth satisfaction, search Orontius; and of this watery heaven, Basilius Magnus, in his Hexam. fol. 40, 41, &c. and Matth. Beroaldus, in his 2d book and 6th chapter. For my self, I am persuaded, that the waters called, The waters above the heavens, are but the clouds and waters engendred in the uppermost air.

SECT. IX.

A conclusion, repeating the sum of the works in the creation, which are reduced to three heads: the creation of matter, the forming of it, the finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but God's incomprehensible eternity. First, he created the matter of all things: and in the first three days he distinguished, and gave to every nature his proper form; the form of levity to that which ascended; to that which descended, the form of gravity: for he separated light from darkness, divided waters from waters, and gathered the waters under the firmament into one place. In the last three days, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the world: he set in the firmament of heaven, the sun, moon, and stars; filled the earth with beasts, the air with fowl, and the sea with fish, giving to all that have life a power generative, thereby to continue their species, and kinds; to creatures vegetative and growing, their seeds in themselves; for <sup>a</sup> he created all things, that they might have their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

S E C T. X.

That nature is no principium per se; nor form, the giver of being: and of our ignorance how second causes should have any proportion with their effects.

AND for this working-power, which we call nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle; the same is nothing else, but the strength and faculty, which God hath infused into every creature, having no other self-ability, than a clock, after it is wound up by a man's hand, hath. Those therefore that attribute unto this faculty, any first or sole power, have therein no other understanding, than such a one hath, who looking into the stern of a ship, and finding it guided by the helm and rudder, doth ascribe some absolute virtue to the piece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides, or of the judgment, which also directeth and commandeth that hand: forgetting in this and in all else, that by the virtue of the first act, all agents work whatsoever they work: Virtute primi actus, agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: For as the mind of man seeth by the organ of the eye, heareth by the ears, and maketh choice by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the ears, &c. and yet it is the mind only, that giveth ability, life, and motion to all these his instruments and organs; so God worketh by angels, by the sun, by the stars, by nature or infused properties, and by men as by several organs, several effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instruments, conduits, and pipes, which carry and disperse what they have received from the head and fountain of the universal. For as it is God's infinite power, and every-where-presence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giveth to the sun power to draw up vapours, to vapours to be made clouds; clouds to contain rain, and rain to fall: so all second and instrumental causes together with nature it self, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtueless, and dead: of all which excellently <sup>b</sup> Orpheus; Per te vivescunt omnia; All things by thee spring forth in youthful green. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable virtues which God hath given to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heavenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his works in their virtues praise him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the heathen philosophers, and those that follow them, have taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among us, that could ever yet conceive it, or express it, ever enrich his own understanding with any certain truth, or ever edify others (not foolish by self-flattery) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the philosophers) Si facultas inveniendæ veritatis huic studio subjaceret, aliquando esset inventa; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingeniis in ejus inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this study (saith he) were means to find out the truth, it had ere this been found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits have been worn out in the enquiry of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. <sup>c</sup> Nam si de una re præcisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur; If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the philosophers were ignorant in nature, and the ways of her working; so were they more curious, than knowing, in their first matter and physical form. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaveth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take concrescence, it hath not been taught, neither are these forms (saith a learned author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, quæ nihil est. Again, how this first matter should be subjectum formarum, and passive, which is understood to precede the form, it is hard to conceive: for to make form, which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrary to all reason, divine and human: only it may be said, that originally there is no other difference between heat and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kind of rational consideration. Leaving therefore these riddles to their loves, who by certain scholastical distinctions wrest and pervert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to prove a false eternity of the world, I think it far safer to affirm with St. Augustine, That all species and kinds are from God, from whom, whatsoever is natural proceedeth, of what kind or estimation soever; from whence are the seeds of all forms, and the forms of all seeds and their motions; A quo est omnis species, a quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cujuscunque generis est, cujuscunque estimationis est; a quo sunt semina formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atque formarum. And thus much Averrois is forced to confess. For all forms (saith he) are, in primo motore; which is also the opinion of <sup>d</sup> Aristotle in the 12th of his Metaph. and of Albertus upon Dionysius.

S E C T. XI.

Of fate; and that the stars have great influence: and that their operations may diversely be prevented or furthered.

AND, as of nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning fate or destiny, of which the opinions of those learned men that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general, and universally powerful than it is, by giving it dominion over the mind of man, and over his will, of which Ovid, and Juvenal:

Servis regna dabunt, captivis fata triumphos.

'Gainst fate no counsel can prevail.

Kingdoms to slaves by destiny,

To captives triumphs given be.

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisanists, and others, as <sup>b</sup> Basil, Augustine, and Thomas have observed: but that fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceived of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. <sup>c</sup> Plotinus out of the astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestial orbs, unchangeably working in inferiour bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things which a rational mind doth not order nor direct. Ptolemy, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to <sup>d</sup> fate a binding and inevitable necessity; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod de unoquoque nostrum fatus est Deus) and the definite lot of all living. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the stars are instruments of far greater use, than to give an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after sun-set: it being manifest, that the diversity of seasons, the winters, and summers, more hot and cold, are not so uncertain by the sun and moon alone, who always keep one and the same course; but that the stars have also their working therein.

And if we cannot deny, but that God hath given virtues to springs and fountains, to cold earth, to plants and stones, minerals, and to the excremental parts of the basest living creatures, why should we rob the beautiful stars of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beauty and magnitude, we may not think, that in the treasury of his wisdom, who is infinite, there can be wanting (even for every star) a peculiar virtue and operation; as every herb, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautify the earth alone, and to cover and shadow her dusty face, but otherwise for the use of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those uncountable glorious bodies set in the firmament, to no other end, than to adorn it; but for instruments and organs of his divine providence, so far as it hath pleased his just will to determine. Origen upon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the firmament, &c. affirmeth, that the stars are not causes (meaning perchance binding causes;) but are as open books, wherein are contained and set down all things whatsoever to come; but not to be read by the eyes of human wisdom: which latter part I believe well, and this saying of Synacides withal: That there are but yet greater things than these be, and we have seen but a few of his works. And though, for the capacity of men, we know somewhat, yet in the true and uttermost virtues of herbs and plants, which on themselves sow and set, and which grow under our feet, we are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestial bodies. For harden (saith <sup>e</sup> Solomon) can we discern the things that are upon the earth, and with great labour find we out those things that are before us: who can then investigate the things that are in heaven? <sup>f</sup> Multum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a little of heavenly things. But in this question of fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the heathen we do not bind God to his creatures, in this supposed necessity of destiny; so on the contrary, we do not rob those beautiful creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes despoiled God of his prerogative, or had God himself constrained the mind and will of man to impious acts by any celestial inforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were justifiable; of whom St. <sup>g</sup> Augustine, Impia perversitate in malis factis rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctorem syderum, quam commissorem scelerum; Where we reprehend them of evil deeds, they again with wicked perverseness urge, that rather the author and creator of the stars, than the doer of the evil, is to be accused.

But that the stars and other celestial bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitive appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora caelestia (saith Damasce) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexiones, & dispositiones; The heavenly bodies (saith he) make in us habits, complexions, and dispositions; for the body (though <sup>h</sup> Galen inforce it further) hath undoubtedly a kind of drawing after it the affections of the mind, especially bodies strong in humour, and weak in virtues; for those of cholerick complexions are subject to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to be transported, where the mind hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her vassals, not her masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonless mind, I am resolved: for all those which were created mortal, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their natural appetites; over all which, celestial bodies (as instruments and executioners of God's providence) have absolute dominion. What we should judge of men, who little differ from beasts, I cannot tell; for as he that contendeth against those inforcements, may easily master or resist them; so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by virtue and piety prepared, putteth himself altogether under the power of his sensual appetite; <sup>i</sup> Vincetur fatum si resistas, vincit si contempseris; Fate will be overcome, if thou resist it; if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the stars or the sun have any power over the minds of men immediately, it is absurd to think, other than as aforesaid, as the same by the body's temper may be affected. Lumen solis ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam movet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the sun (saith St. <sup>j</sup> Augustine) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moveth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a minister, not as a master: Bonus quidem est sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The sun is good to serve, not to sway (saith St. <sup>k</sup> Ambrose.) And St. Augustine, Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above: but he avoucheth not, that superiour bodies have rule over mens minds, which are incorporeal.

But howsoever we are by the stars inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in nature and art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation; and Aristotle himself confesseth, that the heavens do not always work their effects in inferiour bodies, no more than the signs of rain and wind do always come to pass. And it is divers times seen, that paternal virtue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. <sup>l</sup> Est in juvenis patrum virtus; In the young off-spring the fathers virtue is; and so on the contrary, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an interchange; the sons of virtuous men, by an ill constellation, become inclinable to vice; and of vicious men to virtue.

Egregia est soboles scelerato nata parente :

A worthy son is born of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after God's reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the world so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing up, may fashion anew and reform them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reins being let loose) the continual fellowship and familiarity, and the examples of dissolute men, may not corrupt and deform. Vessels will ever retain a favour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult either to cleanse the mind once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet favour of virtue first received, when the mind was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a favourable constellation (allowing that the stars incline the will) and a virtuous education do happily arrive, or the contrary in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding virtuous or vicious, heaven and earth (as it were) running together and agreeing in one: for as the seeds of virtue may, by the art and husbandry of christian counsel, produce better and more beautiful fruit, than the strength of self-nature and kind could have yielded them; so the plants, apt to grow wild, and to change themselves into weeds, by being set in a soil suitable, and like themselves, are made more unsavoury and filled with poison. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adjuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terræ naturam; A wise man assisteth the work of the stars, as the husbandman helpeth the nature of the soil. And Ptolemy himself confesseth thus much, Sapiens, & omina sapientis medici dominabuntur astris; A wise man, and the ominous art of a wise physician, shall prevail against the stars. Lastly, we ought all to know that God created the stars, as he did the rest of the universal; whose influences may be called his reserved and unwritten laws. But let us consider how they bind: even as the laws of men do; for although the kings and princes of the world have by their laws decreed, that a thief and a murderer shall suffer death; and though their ordinances are daily by judges and magistrates (the stars of kings) executed accordingly; yet these laws do not deprive kings of their natural or religious compassion, or bind them without prerogative, to such a severe execution, as that there should be nothing left of liberty to judgment, power, or conscience: the law in his own nature, being no other than a dead tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) do sometimes for causes to themselves known, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves; it were then impious to take that power and liberty from God himself, which his substitutes enjoy; God being mercy, goodness, and charity it self. Otherwise that example of prayer by our Saviour taught; And let us not be led into temptation, but deliver us from evil, had been no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which only knoweth the operation of his own creatures truly) hath assured us, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble prayers and desires may not make frustrate and break atunder: for were it (as the Stoicks conceive) that fate or destiny, though depending upon eternal power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependency, that God himself should in a kind have shut up himself therein; How miserable then were the condition of men (saith Augustine) left altogether without hope.

And if this strength of the stars were so transferred, as that God had quitted unto them all dominion over his creatures; be he Pagan or Christian that so believeth, the only true God of the one, and the imaginary Gods of the other, would thereby be despoiled of all worship, reverence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised us the reward of well-doing, which Christ himself claimed at the hands of the Father (I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do;) and the same God, who hath threatened unto us the sorrow and torment of offences, could not, contrary to his merciful nature, be so unjust, as to bind us inevitably to the destinies or influences of the stars, or subject our souls to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plotinus, that the stars were significant, but not efficient, giving them yet something less than their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them, who would make those glorious creatures of God virtuelss: so I think that we derogate from his eternal and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them the same dominion over our immortal souls, which they have over all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the souls of men loving and fearing God, receive influence from that divine light it self, whereof the sun's clarity, and that of the stars, is by Plato called but a shadow, Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of God's brightness, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this destiny, together with providence, prescience, and predestination, are often confounded, I think it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two; for every man hath not observed it, though all learned men have.

SECT. XII.

Of PRESCIENCE.

Prescience, or foreknowledge (which the Greeks call Prognosis, the Latins Præcognitio, or Præscientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speak of God after the manner of men) goeth before providence: for God foreknew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and prescience is no other than an infallible foreknowledge. For whatsoever our selves foreknow, except the same be to succeed accordingly, it cannot be true that we foreknow it. But this prescience of God (as it is prescience only) is not the cause of any thing futurely succeeding: neither doth God's foreknowledge impose any necessity, or bind. For in that we foreknow that the sun will rise, and set; that all men born in the world shall die again; that after the winter the spring shall come; after the spring, summer, and harvest; and that according to the several seeds that we sow, we shall reap several sorts of grain, yet is not our foreknowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neither doth the knowledge in us bind or constrain the sun to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men persuade themselves) are otherwise manifest and known to all. The eye of man (saith Boetius) beholdeth those things subject to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their own natures. And again out of the same author; Divina providentia rebus gerendis non imponit necessitatem, quia omnia eveniunt ex necessitate, premia bonorum, pena malorum periret; Divine providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity upon things that are to exist; for if all come to pass of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of evil.

S E C T. XIII.

Of PROVIDENCE.

NOW providence (which the Greeks call Pro-noia) is an intellectual knowledge, both foreseeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not only behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which prescience (simply taken) is not: and therefore providence by the philosophers (saith St. Augustine) is divided into memory, knowledge, and care: memory of the past, knowledge of the present, and care of the future: and we our selves account such a man for provident, as, remembering things past, and observing things present, can by judgment, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succeeding. That such a thing there is as providence, the scriptures every where teach us; Moses in many places, the prophets in their predictions, Christ himself and his apostles assure us hereof; and besides the scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the providence of God; yea the Turks themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any peril whatsoever, though death therein do manifestly present itself.

The places of scripture proving providence, are so many, both in general and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place: Sing unto God (saith David) which covereth the heavens with clouds, and prepareth rain for the earth, and maketh the grass to grow upon the mountains, which giveth the beasts their food, and feedeth the young green that cries: b All these wait upon thee, that thou mayst give them food in due season: c and thou shalt drink of the river Chereth (saith God to Elijah) and I have commanded the ravens to feed thee there.

Behold, the fowls of the air, they sow not, nor reap, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Again, e Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea, all the hairs of your head are numbered: And St. Peter, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you: And his judgments are written, saith David.

God therefore, who is every where present, h Who filleth the heavens and the earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that do evil, was therefore by Orpheus called oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things; and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other; for it is contrary to his own word, i Gloriam meam alteri non dabo; I will not give my glory to another. No man commandeth in the king's presence, but by the king's direction; but God is every where present, and king of kings. The example of God's universal providence is seen in his creatures. The father provideth for his children: beasts and birds and all living, for their young ones. If providence be found in second fathers, much more in the first and universal: and if there be a natural loving care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose divine love was the beginning, and is the bond of the universal: Amor divinus rerum omnium est principium, & vinculum universi (saith Plato): Amor Dei est nobis perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumque ejus immobile sustentaculum, ac universæ machine fundamentum; The love of God is the perpetual knot, and link or chain of the world, and the immovable pillar of every part thereof, and the basis and foundation of the universal. God therefore, who could only be the cause of all, can only provide for all, and sustain all; so as to absolute power, to every where presence, to perfect goodness, to pure and divine <sup>k</sup> love; this attribute transcendent hability of providence is only proper and belonging.

S E C T. XIV.

Of PREDESTINATION.

NOW for predestination, we can difference it no otherwise from providence and prescience, than in this; that prescience only foreseeth; providence foreseeth and careth for, and hath respect to all <sup>l</sup> creatures, even from the brightest angels of heaven, to the unworthiest worms of the earth: and predestination (as it is used, especially by divines) is only of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their salvation properly, in the common use of divines; or perdition, as some have used it. Yet m Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word predestination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicity. Divers of the fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom St. Augustine speaking of two cities, and two societies, useth these words: n Quarum est una, quæ prædestinata est in æternum regnare cum Deo, altera æternum supplicium subire cum diabolo; whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reign for ever with God, but the other is to undergo everlasting torment with the devil; for according to Nonius Marcellus, Destinare, est præparare; and of the same opinion are many protestant writers, as o Calvin, Beza, Bucanus, Daneus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the divines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour, I will answer with Gregory, who saith, p Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his own infirmity, perceiveth the reason of his blindness. And again with St. Augustine, Occulta esse causa potest, injusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his predestination may be, unjust it cannot be.

S E C T. XV.

Of fortune: and of the reason of some things that seem to be by fortune, and against reason and providence.

LASTLY, seeing destiny or necessity is subsequent to God's providence, and seeing that the stars have no other dominion, than is before spoken, and that nature is nothing, but, as Plato calleth it, Dei artem, vel artificiosum Dei organum; The art, or artificial organ of God: And Cusanus, divini præcepti instrumentum; The instrument of the divine precept: we may then with better reason reject that kind of idolatry, or God of fools, called, fortune or chance; a goddess, the most revered, and the most reviled of all other, but not ancient: for Homer maketh her the daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Messenicks. The Greeks call her τυχην, signifying a relative being, or betiding, so as before Homer's time this great lady was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfeit gods, hath not a word of Fortune; yet afterwards she grew so great and omnipotent, as from kings and kingdoms, to beggars and cottages, she ordered all things, resisting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the possessor thereof miserable; valuing the folly of the most foolish, by making their success prosperous: inasmuch as the actions of men were said to be but the sports of fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens lives, but her pastimes: of which <sup>a</sup>Palladius, Vita hominum ludus fortunæ est; The life of man is the play of fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsels, have equal success to those by the best judgment conducted, therefore had fortune the same external figure with sapience; whereof Athenæus:

*Longissime a sapientia fors diffidet,
Sed multa perficit tamen simillima:*
From wisdom fortune differs far,
And yet in works most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly understood) is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the success of human actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be given, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant; contrary to this true ground of Plato, Nihil est ortum sub sole, cujus causa legitima non præcesserit; Nothing ever came to pass under the sun, of which there was not a just preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinction, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, besides the intention of the inferior, but not besides the intention of the superior; Præter intentionem inferioris, sed non præter intentionem superioris (to wit, the ordinance of God;) and therefore (saith <sup>b</sup>Melanchton) Quod poetæ fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; whom the poets call fortune, we know to be God. And that this is true, the scripture in many places teacheth us; as in the Law of murder, <sup>c</sup>He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid wait, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by chance: and in <sup>d</sup>Deuteronomy, where the slipping the ax from the helve, whereby another is slain, was the work of God himself; we in our phrase attribute this accident, to chance or fortune: and in <sup>e</sup>Proverbs, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord; so as that which seemeth most casual and subject to fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as all things else; and hereof the wiser sort, and the best learned of the philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks, to this effect, that the same power which they called Animam mundi, the soul of the world, was no other than that incomprehensible wisdom, which we express by the name of God, governing every being as well in heaven as in earth; to which wisdom and power they sometime gave the title of necessity or fate, because it bindeth by inevitable ordinance: sometime, the style of fortune, because of many effects there appear unto us no certain causes. To this effect speaketh St. Augustine in his questions upon Genesis the first book: the same hath Seneca in his 4th of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which sect he was: & For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by divers terms, according as he useth, and exerciseth his power diversly.

But it may be objected, that if fortune and chance were not sometimes the causes of good and evil in men, but an idle voice, whereby we express success; how comes it then, that so many worthy and wise men depend upon so many unworthy and empty-headed fools? That riches and honour are given to external men, and without kernel; and so many learned, virtuous, and valiant men wear out their lives in poor and dejected estates? In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partiality of man's affection, but the fashioning and not fashioning of our selves according to the nature of the time wherein we live: for whosoever is most able, and best sufficient to discern, and hath withal an honest and open heart and loving truth: if princes, or those that govern, endure no other discourse than their own flatteries: then, I say, such an one, whose virtue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall evermore hang under the wheel; which kind of deserving well and receiving ill, we always falsely charge fortune withal. For whosoever shall tell any great man or magistrate, that he is not just; the general of an army, that he is not valiant; and great ladies, that they are not fair; shall never be a counsellor, a captain, or a courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wise with a wise prince, valiant with a valiant, and just with him that is just, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperity; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrary qualities; fail with the tide of the time, and alter form and condition, as the estate or the estate's master changeth: otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attain to honour and riches, but by such an observant slavish course? These men having nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kind of wondering at other men, and by making them believe that all their vices are virtues, and all their dully actions crystalline, have yet in all ages prospered equally with the most virtuous, if not exceeded them. For, according to Menander, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Every fool is won with his own pride, and others flattering applause: So as whosoever will live altogether out of himself, and study other mens humours, and observe them, shall never be unfortunate; and on the contrary, that man which prizeth truth and virtue (except the season wherein he liveth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodness, fruitful) shall never prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is also a token of a worldly wise man, not to war or contend in vain against the nature of times wherein he liveth: for such a one is often the author of his own misery; but best it were to follow the advice, which the pope gave the bishops of that age, our of Ovid, while the Avian hereby raged:

<sup>b</sup> Dum furor in cursu est, currenti cede furori.

While fury gallops on the way,
Let no man fury's gallop stay.

<sup>a</sup> Sen ep. 91. Aut. viét. de Pettinace, Sen. ep. 74. What more fooliſh than for him that deſpairs (eſpecially of the effect) to be entangled with endleſs contentions? Whoſoever therefore will ſet before him Machiavel's two marks to ſhoot at (to wit, riches, and glory, muſt ſet on and take off a back of iron to a weak wooden bow, that it may fit both the ſtrong and the feeble; for as he, that firſt deviſed to add ſails to rowing veſſels, did either ſo proportion them as being faſtened aloft,

But of this diſpute of fortune, and the reſt, or of whatſoever Lords or Gods, imaginary powers, or cauſes, the wit (or rather fooliſhneſs) of man hath found out: let us reſolve with St. Paul, who hath taught us, that there is <sup>a</sup> but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him, and one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diverſities of operations, but God is the ſame, which worketh all in all.

CHAP. II.

Of Man's eſtate in his firſt Creation, and of God's reſt.

SECT. I.

Of the image of God, according to which man was firſt created.

THE creation of all other creatures being finiſhed, the heavens adorned, and the earth replenished, God ſaid, <sup>a</sup> Let us make man in our own image, according to our likenenſs.

Man is the laſt and moſt admirable of God's works to us known: <sup>b</sup> Ingens miraculum homo; Man is the greateſt wonder (ſaith Plato out of Mercurius;) Naturæ ardentiffimæ artificium; The artificial work of the moſt ardent or fire-like nature (as ſaith Zoroaſter;) though the ſame be meant, not for any excellency external, but in reſpect of his internal form, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, becauſe it hath an eſſence, immortal and ſpiritual in qualities, becauſe the ſame was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, becauſe man was made lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

More holy than the reſt, and underſtanding more, A living creature wants, to rule all made before, So man began to be.

Of this image and ſimilitude of God, there is much diſpute among the fathers, ſchoolmen, and late writers: ſome of the fathers conceive, that man was made after the image of God, in reſpect chiefly of empire and dominion, as St. Chryſoſtom, Ambroſe, and ſome others: which St. Ambroſe denieth to the woman in theſe words, Ut ſicut Deus unus, ab eo fieret homo unus; & quomodo ex Deo uno omnia, ita ex uno homine omne genus eſſet ſuper faciem totius terræ: unus igitur unum fecit, qui unitatis quæ haberet imaginem; That as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kind ſhould be upon the face of the whole earth: therefore he being one, made one, that ſhould have the image of his unity. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the ſame verſe, that man was after the image of God in reſpect of rule and power; it is written Dominamini in the plural number; and let them rule over the fiſh in the ſea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceive, that man is ſaid to be after the image of God in reſpect of his immortal ſoul only: becauſe as God is inviſible, ſo the ſoul of man is inviſible; as God is immortal and incorporeal, ſo is the ſoul of man immortal and incorporeal; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, ſo but one ſoul which governeth the body of man; and as God is wholly in every part of the world, ſo is the ſoul of man wholly in every part of the body: Anima eſt tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The ſoul is wholly in the whole body, and wholly in every part thereof, according to Ariſtotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men, deny that doctrine; which that it is otherwiſe than potentially true, all the Ariſtotelians in the world ſhall never prove. Theſe and the like arguments do the Jews make (ſaith Toſtatus) and theſe reſemblances, between the infinite God, and the finite man.

The ſchool-men reſemble the mind or ſoul of man to God, in this reſpect eſpecially; becauſe that as in the mind there are three diſtinct powers, or faculties (to wit) memory, underſtanding, and will; and yet all theſe being of real differences, are but one mind: ſo in God there are three diſtinct perſons, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghoſt, and yet but one God. They alſo make the image and ſimilitude divers; and again, they diſtinguiſh between imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei; and ſpin into ſmall threds with ſubtile diſtinctions many times the plainneſs and ſincerity of the ſcriptures: their wits being like that ſtrong water, that eateth thro' and diſſolveth the pureſt gold. Victorinus alſo maketh the image of God to be ſubſtantial, but not the ſimilitude: Sed in ſubſtantia nomen qualitatis declarativum; A word declaring quality in the ſubſtance. Out of which words, and that which followeth, it is inferred, that as the image and ſimilitude do greatly diſfer, ſo the ſinful ſoul doth not therefore leave to be the image of God; but it hath not his ſimilitude, except it be holy and righteous. St. Auguſtine alſo againſt Adimantus the Manichee affirmeth, that by sin, the perfection of this image is lost in man; and in his retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the similitude is more largely taken, than the image.

But howsoever the school-men and others distinguish, or whatsoever the fathers conceive; sure I am, that St. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith, As we have borne the image of the earthly, so shall we bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the scriptures, that the words image and similitude were used but in one sense, and in this place the better to express each other; whatsoever Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knows, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himself in the scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, ever conceived. Now as St. Paul useth the word (image) for both: so St. James useth the word (similitude) for both, in these words: Therewith bless we God even the Father, and therewith curse we men, which are made after the similitude of God. Howsoever therefore St. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegancy in writing, to make some difference: as where he writeth, Confitemur imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inveniri; We confess that this image is found in eternity, but his similitude in manners, that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the mind; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi vero possit esse imago aliqua, in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, proculdubio nec imago est; As if (says he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The very words of the text make this most manifest, as, Let us make man in our image, according to our likeness; which is, Let us make man in our image, that he may be like us: and in the next verse following, God himself maketh it plain; for there he useth the word (image) only as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first verse of the fifth chapter, the word (similitude) is used again by it self, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. And this similitude St. Paul, calleth the image; Put on (saith he) the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him. And in Syracides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may believe St. Paul before Peter Lombard and other school-men, then it is as manifest as words can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same; for St. Paul useth both the words directly in one sense. For they turned the glory of the incorruptible God, to the similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to prove, that man was formed after the image of God, both in body and mind: Nulla pars in homine, quæ non fuerit hujusce imaginis particeps; No part in a man (saith he) which was not participating God's image; for God said, Let us make man according to our own image. But the soul alone is not man, but the Hypostasis or whole man compounded of body and soul. The body of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his body, must needs be the image of God. Against which opinion of this learned man, his own objection seemeth to me sufficient, where he alledgeth that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortal man, yet is not the whole man mortal, but the body only: so when God said, Let us make man after our image, he meant the soul of man, and not the body of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith St. Augustine;) Cursed is he that referreth the Deity of God to the lineaments of man's body: Deus enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus humanum divine (saith Philo;) God is not partaker of human form, nor human body of the form divine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in shadow: Let us then know and consider, that God, who is eternal and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his nature and his word; an error of the Anthropomorphitæ, against the very essence and majesty of God.

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more divine understanding than these gross Hereticks: Ad similitudinem Dei propius accedebat humana virtus, quam figura; The virtue which is in man (saith he) came nearer the similitude of God than the figure. For God is a spiritual substance, invisible, and most simple; God is a just God, God is merciful, God is charity it self, and (in a word) goodness it self, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himself to teach us, and to make us known of himself. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his unexcogitable power and perfectness? Certainly, not in dominion alone; for the devil is said to be the prince of this world, and the kingdom of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father: neither because man hath an immortal soul, and therein the faculties of memory, understanding, and will; for the devils are also immortal, and participate those faculties, being called dæmones, because scientes of knowledge and subtilty: neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who have rebelled against God? who have made gods of the vilest beasts, of serpents, of cats, of owls, yea, even of shameful parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet do I not condemn the opinion of St. Chrysostom and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with justice and piety; for God did not only make man a ruler and governor over the fishes of the sea, the fowls of heaven (or of the air) and over the beasts of the field; but God gave unto man a dominion over men, he appointed kings to govern them, and judges to judge them in equity. Neither do I exclude reason, as it is the ability of understanding. For I do not conceive, that Irenæus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale only; but that he understood it better, with Sybilla; Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens; Man that is endued with right reason is said to resemble God (that is) by right reason to know and confess God his Creator, and the same God to serve, love, and obey; and therefore said St. Augustine (who herein came nearer the truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem & similitudinem suam in mente; God made man in respect of the intellect after his own image and similitude; and

SECT. II.

Of the intellectual mind of man, in which there is much of the image of God; and that this image is much deformed by sin.

BUT mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is, forma vel natura hominis; The form or nature of man; but this faculty or gift of God, called mens, is taken for prima vis animi, the principal strength of the mind, [or soul] cujus actus est perpetua veritatis contemplatio; whose act [exercise, or office] is the perpetual contemplation of truth; and therefore it is also called intellectus divinus, intellectus contemplativus, & anima contemplativa; A divine understanding, and an intellect or mind contemplative. Est autem mens nostra (saith Cusanus) vis comprehendendi; & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi virtutibus compositum; Our intellectual mind (saith he) is a power of comprehending; even the whole, that is in this kind powerful, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: unto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that he esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Machabees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) than the light from the sun: for this mens, or understanding (saith Mercurius) est Deus in hominibus; Is God in men; or rather (and which I take to be his meaning) is the image of God in man. For, as the sun is not of the same essence or nature with the divine light, but a body illightned, and an illumination created; so is this mens or understanding in men, not of the essence of God's infinite understanding, but a power and faculty of our souls the purest; or, the lumen animæ rationalis, by the true and eternal light illightned. And this mens others call animam animæ, the soul of the soul; or, as St. Augustine, the eye of the soul, or receptacle of sapience and divine knowledge, Quæ amorem sapientie tanquam ducem sequitur; Which followeth after the love of sapience as her guide (saith Philo;) between which and reason; between which and the mind, called anima; between which and that power which the Latins call animus, there is this difference: reason, is that faculty by which we judge and discourse; anima, by which we live. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, vivificat; [or] The soul is that which doth animate the body, that is, giveth it life; for death is the separation of body and soul: and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great director hath in the world, the same hath this anima, or mind, or, soul in man. Anima, is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeth, which calleth this mens, or divine understanding, Perspicacem animæ partem; The perceiving part of the mind, or, the light by which the soul discerneth: Dormientium mens, non anima, sopitur; & in furiosis mens extinguitur, anima manet: In men that sleep it is this (mens, or) understanding, and not the mind or soul, which is illightned, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, and in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, but not the soul; for mad men do live, though illightned.

Therefore this word being often used for the soul being life, is attributed abusively to mad men, when we say that they are of a distract mind, instead of a broken understanding: which word (mind) we use also for opinion, as, I am of this mind, or, that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or virtues, as, he is of an honest mind, or, a man of a just mind: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mind's sake: and Aristotle sometimes useth this word (mens) for the phantasy, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we have without discourse: oftentimes for spirits, angels, and intelligences: but as it is used in the proper signification, including both the understanding agent and possible, it is described to be a pure, simple, substantial act, not depending upon matter, but having relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the soul, whereby it doth understand, not depending upon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to be dissevered, as, eternal from that which is mortal. Hereof excellently Mercurius; Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei. Deus menti præest, mens animæ, anima corpori; The soul (meaning that which giveth life) is the image of this understanding, or mens; and this (mens) or understanding is the image of God. God is president or ruler over this understanding, this understanding over the soul, and this soul over the body. This division and distinction out of the Platonicks, and Peripateticks, I leave to the reader to judge of. That Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marcellus Ficinus in his 9th book of the soul's immortality, laboureth to prove. Zanchius doth not differ from Ficinus in words; for (saith he) Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam, non eget mens organo; tanquam medio, per quod intelligat: quanquam eget objecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectionem concipiat. Hoc autem objectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasiā prolata: To exercise the faculty of understand, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a mean, by which it may understand: but it needeth an object, whereon to look, and whence to conceive the act of understanding. This object are the phantasms, or the resemblances of things received from the sense, and carried to the phantasy. But in effect, this conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the phantasy, in representing the object to the understanding, to be a corporal Organum; neither can it be understood to be an Organum of any thing, but of the understanding. And he addeth, that the resemblance of things in man's imagination, are, to his understanding and mind, as colours are to the sight; whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasy it self is to the faculty of understanding, as the eye is to the faculty of seeing: and as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, how the mind in all her actions maketh use of the body, and hath communion with the body, I refer the reader to a most grave and learned discourse in the last reply of M. D. Bilson, late bishop of Winchester, unto Hen. Jacob. Howsoever the truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the mind it self, by which we live, nor in respect of our souls simply, by which we are immortal, that we are made after the image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selves to God in mente, and in respect of that pure faculty, which is never separate from the contemplation and love of God. Yet this is not all; for St. Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the mind or soul, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which, being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to be after the image of God: whose words are these, Non propterea imago Dei est, quia sui meminit mens, seque intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of St. Augustine;) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere, ac diligere eum a quo facta est, (that is) The mind (or mens) was not therefore the image of God, because it remembereth, understandeth, and loveth it self; but because it can remember, understand, and love God, who created it. And that this image may be deformed and made unprofitable, hear Basil; Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis hujus pulchritudinem deformavit, & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiæ affectibus immergit: Man was made after the image and similitude of God, but sin hath deformed the beauty of this image, and made it unprofitable, by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscence.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of immortality, nor in reason, nor in dominion, nor in any one of these by it self, nor in all these joyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and understanding, with the other faculties of the soul, we are made capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of original righteousness, most perfectly infused by God into the mind and soul of man in his first creation. For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seal of God's image (though reason may be said to be of her gift, which, joined to the soul, is a part of the essential constitution of our proper species) but from the bountiful grace of the Lord of all goodness, who breathed life into earth, and contrived within the trunk of dust and clay, the imitable hability of his own piety and righteousness.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which dominion hath) do those that are powerful retain the image of God, as according to his commandments they exercise the office or magistracy to which they are called, and sincerely walk in the ways of God, which in the scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this image, as they fear, love, and serve God truly, that is, for the love of God alone, and do not bruise and deface his seal by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obstinate sins. For the unjust mind cannot be after the image of God, seeing God is justice it self; the blood-thirsty hath it not, for God is charity and mercy it self; falsehood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soul, together with God: and to be short, there is no likelihood between pure light and black darkness, between beauty and deformity, or between righteousness and reprobation. And though nature, according to common understanding, have made us capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this image of God's goodness, which the sensual souls of beasts cannot perceive; yet were that aptitude naturally more inclinable to follow and embrace the false and duncle pleasures of this stage-play world, than to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanship of God's wisdom, and the liberality of his mercy, formed eyes to our souls, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest heavens, and thence bring knowledge and object to the mind and soul, to contemplate the ever-during glory, and termless joy, prepared for those which retain the image and similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and unrent the garment of the new man, which, after the image of God, is created in righteousness, and holiness, as saith St. Paul. Now whereas it is thought by some of the fathers, as by St. Augustine, with whom St. Ambrose joyneth, that by sin, the perfection of the image is lost, and not the image it self: both opinions by this distinction may be reconciled (to wit) that the image of God, in man, may be taken two ways; for, either it is considered according to natural gifts, and consisteth therein; namely, to have a reasonable and understanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the image of God is more lost by sin than the very reasonable or understanding nature, &c. is lost (or sin doth not abolish and take away these natural gifts:) or, the image of God is considered, according to supernatural gifts, namely, of divine grace and heavenly glory, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the natural image; and this manner of similitude and image of God is wholly blotted out, and destroyed by sin.

SECT. III.

Of our base and frail bodies: and that the care thereof should yield to the immortal soul.

THE external man God formed out of the dust of the earth, or (according to the signification of the word, Adam) of Adamath, of red earth, or ex limo terræ, out of the slime of the earth, or a mixed matter of earth and water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamath (id est) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an image or statue of clay, but out of clay, earth, or dust, God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

That man was formed of earth and dust did Abraham acknowledge, when in humble fear he called unto God, to save Sodom: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speak, I that am but dust and ashes: And, In these houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, do our souls inhabit, according to Job. And though our own eyes do everywhere behold the sudden and resistless assaults of death, and nature assureth us by never-failing experience, and reason by infallible demonstration, that our times upon the earth have neither certainty nor durability; that our bodies are but the anvils of pain and diseases, and our minds the hives of unnumbered cares, sorrows, and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posts, against which envy and fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappiness of our condition, and the dark ignorance which covereth the eyes of our understanding, that we only prize, pamper, and exalt this vassal and slave of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast away leisure) the imprisoned immortal soul, which can neither die with the reprobate, nor perish with the mortal parts of virtuous men: seeing God's justice in the one, and his goodness in the other, is exercised for evermore, as the ever-living subjects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that we examine this great account? never while we have our vanity left us to spend: we plead for titles, till our breath fail us; dig for riches, while our strength enableth us; exercise malice, while we can revenge; and then when time hath beaten from us both youth, pleasure, and health, and that nature it self hatcheth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must go the way from whence we shall not return; and that our bed is made ready for us in the dark; and then, I say, looking over-late into the bottom of our conscience (which pleasure and ambition had locked up from us all our lives) we behold therein the fearful images of our actions past, and withal this terrible inscription: That God will bring every work into judgment, that man hath done under the sun.

But what examples have ever moved us? what persuasions reformed us? or what threatnings made us afraid? we behold other mens tragedies play'd before us, we hear what is promised and threatened: but the world's bright glory hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights (with which we only see) do neither look up towards termless joys, nor down towards endless sorrows, till we neither know, nor can look for any thing else, at the world's hands. Of which excellently Marius Victor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil denique morbi
Egerunt, fuimus, qui nunc sumus, isque periculis
Tentati; nibilo meliores reddimur unquam, Sub vitis nullo culparum sine manentes.*

Diseases, famine, enemies, in us no change have wrought, [caught:
What erst we were, we are; still in the same snare
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In vice we dwell, in sin that hath no end.

But let us not flatter our immortal souls herein; for to neglect God all our lives, and know that we neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that we offend him, casting our hopes on the peace, which we trust to make at parting, is no other than a rebellious presumption, and (that which is the worst of all) even a contemptuous laughing to scorn, and deriding of God, his laws and precepts. b Frustra sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vain, saith Bernard, which in this sort flatter themselves with God's mercy.

SECT. IV.

Of the spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his creation.

IN this frame and carcass God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a living soul: (that is) God gave a body of earth and of corruptible matter, a soul spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men use, but God breathed the spirit of life and immortality into man, as he breatheth his grace daily into such as love and fear him. c The spirit of God (saith Elubu in Job) bath made me, and the breath of the Almighty bath given me life: In qua sententia (saith Rabanus) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne late patemur Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labiis suis formasse in faciem formati, ut vivere possit & spirare, ut sic habere: nam & propheta cum ait, manibus fecerunt me, &c. tropica hac locutione magis suam propria (id est, juxta consuetudinem, qua solent homines operari) locutus est: In which sentence (saith he) the beggarliness of carnal sense is to be avoided, lest perhaps we should think, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with jaws or lips upon his face (being formed) that he might live, and have the spirit of life: for the prophet also when he saith, thy hands have made me, spake this tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custom which men use in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui scripturas sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the scriptures in a carnal sense? By this breath was infused into man, both life and soul, and therefore this (soul) the philosophers call Animam, quæ vivificat corpus, & animat; Which doth animate and give life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giveth understanding, saith Job, and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soul of man, returneth again to God that gave it, as the body returneth unto the earth, out of which it was taken; according to Ecclesiastes: d And dust shall return to the earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall return to God that gave it. Neither is this word (spirit) usually otherwise taken in the scriptures, than for the soul; as when Stephen cried unto God: e Domine, suscipe spiritum meum, Lord Jesus receive my spirit: and in St. John, f And Jesus bowed his head, and gave up the ghost, or spirit; (which was) that his life and soul left his body dead. And that the immortal soul of man differeth from the souls of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, g Let the waters bring forth in abundance every creeping thing, and let the earth bring forth the living thing according to his kind, the beast of the earth, &c. But of man it is written, Let us make man in our own image, &c. and further, that h the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the water and earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life; so shall they again be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath everlasting, which God breathed into man, shall, according to Ecclesiastes, i return again to God that gave it.

SECT. V.

That man is (as it were) a little world: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or model, or brief story of the universal: in whom God concluded the creation, and work of the world, and whom he made the last and most excellent of his creatures, being internally endued with a divine understanding, by which he might contemplate and serve his Creator, after whose image he was formed, and endued with the powers and faculties of reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might govern and rule the world, and all other God's creatures therein. And whereas God created three sorts of living natures (to wit) angelical, rational, and brutal; giving to angels an intellectual, and to beasts a sensual nature, he vouchsafed unto man, both the k intellectual of angels, the sensitive of beasts, and the proper rational belonging unto man, and therefore (saith Gregory Nazianzene) l Homo est utriusque nature vinculum; Man is the bond and chain which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of man's body there is a representation of the universal, and (by allusion) a kind of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little world. m Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum, in brevi magnum, atque exiguo totum, in terris statuit; God therefore placed in the earth the man whom he had made, as it were another world, the great and large world in the small and little world; for out of the earth and dust was formed the flesh of man, and therefore heavy and lumpish; the bones of his body we may compare to the hard rocks and stones, and therefore strong and durable; of which Ovid:

*Inde genus durum sumus, experiensque laborum,
Et documenta damus qua simus origine nati:*

From thence our kind hard-hearted is,

Enduring pain and care,

Approving that our bodies of

A stony nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it self by the branches of veins through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by brooks and rivers over all the earth; his breath to the air, his natural heat to the inclosed warmth which the earth hath in it self, which, stirred up by the heat of the sun, assisteth nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the earth bringeth forth; Our radical moisture, oyl, or balsamum (whereon the natural heat feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertility of the earth; the hairs of man's body, which adorns, or overshadows it, to the grass, which covereth the upper face and skin of the earth; our generative power, to nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light wandring, and unstable clouds, carried every where with uncertain winds; our eyes, to the light of the sun and moon; and the beauty of our youth, to the flowers of the spring, which, either in a very short time, or with the sun's heat, dry up and wither away, or the fierce puffs of wind blow them from the stalks; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure understanding (formerly called mens, and that which always looketh upwards) to those intellectual natures, which are always present with God; and lastly, our immortal souls (while they are righteous) are by God himself beautified with the title of his own image and similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man just, or good, or righteous (for, In angelis deprehensa est stultitia, Behold, He found folly in his Angels, saith Job;) yet, with such a kind of difference, as there is between the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodness in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his own righteousness. In this also is the little world of man compared, and made more like the universal (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the four complexions resemble the four elements, and the seven ages of man the seven planets; whereof, our infancy is compared to the Moon, in which we seem only to live and grow, as plants; the second age to Mercury, wherein we are taught and instructed; our third age to Venus, the days of love, desire, and vanity; the fourth to the Sun, the strong, flourishing, and beautiful age of man's life; the fifth to Mars, in which we seek honour and victory, and in which our thoughts travel to ambitious ends; the sixth age is ascribed to Jupiter, in which we begin to take account of our times, judge of our selves, and grow to the perfection of our understanding; the last and seventh to Saturn, wherein our days are sad, and over-cast, and in which we find by dear and lamentable experience, and by the loss which can never be repaired, that of all our vain passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more we are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when time hath made unsociable to others, we become a burthen to our selves: being of no other use, than to hold the riches we have from our successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and never before, prepare for our eternal habitation, which we pass on unto with many sighs, groans, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowful business of a wretched life; towards which we always travel both sleeping and waking: neither have those beloved companions of honour and riches any power at all to hold us any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soever we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death, whose doors lie open at all hours; and to all persons. For this tide of man's life, after it once turneth and declineth, ever runneth with a perpetual ebb and falling stream, but never floweth again: our leaf once fallen, springeth no more; neither doth the sun or the summer adorn us again, with the garments of new leaves and flowers.

*Redditur arboribus florens revirentibus ætas;
Ergo non homini, quod fuit ante, redit.*

To which I give this sense.

The plants and trees made poor and old
By winter envious,
The spring-time bounteous
Covers again from shame and cold:
But never man repair'd again
His youth and beauty lost,
Though art, and care, and cost,
Do promise nature's help in vain.

And of which,

CATULLUS, EPIGRAM. 53.

*Soles occidere & redire possunt:
Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux,
Nox est perpetua una dormienda.*

The sun may set and rise:
But we contrariwise
Sleep after our short light
One everlasting night.

For if there were any baiting place, or rest, in the course or race of man's life, then, according to the doctrine of the Academics, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in natural living things, and as the sap and juice, wherein the life of plants is preserved, both evermore ascend or descend; so is it with the life of man, which is always either increasing toward ripeness and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottenness and dissolution.

SECT. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first creation, to dispose of himself.

THESE be the miseries which our first parents brought on all mankind, unto whom God in his creation gave a free and unconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberal choice of all things, with one only prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortal and immortal life, a nature celestial and terrene, and (indeed) God gave man to himself, to be his own guide, his own workman, and his own painter, that he might frame or describe unto himself what he pleased, and make election of his own form. <sup>a</sup> God made man in the beginning, (saith Siracides) and left him in the hands of his own counsel. Such was the liberality of God, and man's felicity: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonless, brought with them into the world (saith Lucilius) and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their dams, the nature, which they could not change; and the supernal spirits or angels were from the beginning, or soon after, of that condition, in which they remain in perpetual eternity. But (as aforesaid) God gave unto man all kind of seeds and grafts of life (to wit) the vegetative life of plants, the sensual of beasts, the rational of man, and the intellectual of angels; whereof which soever he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should futurely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his own choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first father, was enigmatically described by Asclepius Atheniensis (saith Mirandula) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagoreans, and ancient poets, wherein it was feigned, that men were transformed into divers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mens conditions, from reason to brutality, from virtue to vice, from meekness to cruelty, and from justice to oppression. For by the lively image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortal men; as by serpents were signified deceivers; by lions, oppressors and cruel men; by swine, men given over to lust and sensuality; by wolves, ravening and greedy men; which also St. Matthew resembleth to false prophets, <sup>d</sup> which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves: by the images of stones and flocks, foolish and ignorant men; by vipers, ungrateful men; of which <sup>e</sup> St. John Baptist, O ye generation of vipers, &c.

SECT. VII.

Of God's ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the universal created was exceeding good.

IN this work of man, God finished the creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested: for God commanded, and it was finished, Cui voluisse est fecisse; With whom to will is to make, saith Beda. Neither did God so rest, that he left the world made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for <sup>d</sup> My father worketh to this day (saith Christ) and I work; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but (as aforesaid) gave unto man a power generative, and so to the rest of living creatures, to plants and flowers, their seeds in themselves; and commanded man to <sup>e</sup> multiply and fill the earth, and the earth and sea to bring forth creatures according to their several kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good, but that he foreknew not, and comprehended not, the beginning and end before they were; for God made every plant of the field before it was in the earth, but he gave to all things which he had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from so good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good, and from whose bounteous purity and from so excellent a cause there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect. For man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his own death and mortality; and for the cruelty of man's heart, was the earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first age destroyed, but the righteous man Noah and his family, with those creatures which the ark contained, reserved by God to replenish the earth.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of PARADISE.

SECT. I.

That the seat of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should err.

CONCERNING the first habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a garden east-ward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made, Gen. ii. 6. Of this seat and place of Paradise, all ages have held dispute; and the opinions and judgments have been in effect, as divers, among those, that have written upon this part of Genesis, as upon any one place therein, seeming most obscure: Some there are, that have conceived the being of the terrestrial Paradise, without all regard of the world's geography, and without any respect of east and west, or any consideration of the place where Moses wrote, and from whence he directed (by the quarters of the heavens) the way how to find out and judge, in what region of the world this garden was by God planted, wherein he was exceeding respective and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first interpretation; or trusting to their own judgments, understood one place for another; and one error is so fruitful, as it begetteth a thousand children, if the licentiousness thereof be not timely restrained. And thirdly, those writers which gave themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so observant spectators of those masters, whom they admired and believed in, as they thought it safer to condemn their own understanding, than to examine theirs. For (saith Vadianus in his epistle of Paradise) magnum errorem, magnorum virorum auctoritate persuasi, transmittimus; We pass over many gross errors, by the authority of great men led and perswaded. And it is true, that many of the fathers were far wide from the understanding of this place. I speak it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their learning and their piety, and yet not bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men; Et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should be proud of himself, God hath distributed unto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their own weakness: Nulli unquam dedit omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. <sup>f</sup> St. Paul confess'd that he knew not, whether he were taken up into the third heaven in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himself acknowledges thus much, <sup>g</sup> that neither men, nor angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to <sup>h</sup> St. Jude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi invenitur? (saith Job) But where is wisdom found? <sup>i</sup> and where is the place of understanding? Man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the land of the living. And therefore seeing God found folly in his angels, mens judgments (which inhabit in the houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and to the fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our salvation dependeth not.

SECT. II.

A recital of strange opinions touching Paradise.

NOW touching paradise, first it is to be enquired, Whether there were a paradise, or no? or whether Moses's description were altogether mystical and allegorical? as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others, have affirmed; and that under the names of those four rivers, Pison, Gebon, Hiddekel and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge, there were delivered unto us other mysteries and significations; as, that by the <sup>a</sup> four rivers, were meant the four cardinal virtues, Justice, Temperance, Fortitude and Prudence; or (by others) Oil, Wine, Milk and Honey. This allegorical understanding of Paradise by Origen divulged, was again by Fran. Georgius received (saith Sixtus Senensis;) whose frivolous imaginations Sixtus himself doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34th annotation of his 5th book, fol. 338. the last edition.

<sup>b</sup> St. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the allegorical construction, and set Paradise in the third heaven, and in the virtues of the mind, Et in nostro principali, which is, as I conceive it, in mente, or in our souls: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soul or mind; by Adam, mens or understanding; by Eve, the sense; by the serpent, delectation; by the tree of good and evil, sapience; and by the rest of the trees, the virtues of the mind, or in the mind planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, upon 1 Corinth. cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celestial and terrestrial Paradise; the one, into which St. Paul was wrap'd; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysamenis was of opinion, that a Paradise had been; but that there was not now any mark thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withal the places now not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole earth; to which opinion Vadianus inclineth, as I conceive his words, in two several places. First, upon this; Fill the earth, Gen. 10. of which he gives this judgment: Hoc ipso etiam quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini universis animantibus, subjicite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, Et omnigenis (ut tum erat) fructibus consistam, sedem Et hortum illum Adæ, Et posteritatis future fuisse; These words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruit and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule over every creature, do clearly shew, that the universal earth, set or filled with all sorts of fruits (as then it was) was the garden and seat of Adam, and of his future posterity. And afterward he acknowledgeth the place, out of the <sup>c</sup> Acts, Apostolus ex uno sanguine omne genus humanum ideo factum docet, ut habitarent super universam faciem terræ: tota igitur terra paradisus ille erat; The apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell over all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith he) was that Paradise. Which conjectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet he acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certain place, and peculiar garden; which place Goropius findeth near the river of Accefines, in the confines of India.

<sup>d</sup> Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise under the equinoctial; and Postellus, quite contrary, under the north pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, and all their sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs; who would either make Paradise a figure, or sacrament only, or else would have it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote region of the air. Strabus and Rabanus were both sick of this vanity, with Origen and Philo: So was our venerable <sup>e</sup> Bede and <sup>f</sup> Peter Comestor, and <sup>g</sup> Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins says of Philo Judeus, that he wonder'd, Quo malo genio afflatus, By what evil angel he was blown up into this error; so can I but greatly marvel at the learned men, who so grossly and blindly wander'd; seeing Moses, and after him the prophets, do so plainly describe this place by the region in which it was planted, by the kingdoms and provinces bordering it, by the rivers which water'd it, and by the points of the compass upon which it lay, in respect of Judea, or Canaan.

Noviomagus also upon Beda, De natura rerum, believeth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beauty ascribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the ocean was that fountain from whence the four rivers, Pison, Gebon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning; for he could not think it possible, that these rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates (whereof the one ran through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one fountain, were it not out of the fountain of the ocean.

SECT. III.

That there was a true local Paradise eastward in the country of Eden.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was upon the earth, the words of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, <sup>h</sup> And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made: and howsoever the vulgar translation, called Jerom's translation, hath converted this place thus, Plantaverit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis a principio: The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning; putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a region. For, what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his treatise of Paradise) that he planted a garden of pleasure, or, that a river went out of pleasure to water the garden? but the seventy interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, The Paradise of Eden; and so doth the Chaldean paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a noun appellative; which region, in respect of the fertility of the soil, of the many beautiful rivers and goodly woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) do always keep their leaves, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantness, or delicacy; as the Spaniards call the country, opposite to the isle of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a country, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof; so was Eden a region, called pleasure or delicacy for its pleasure or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth flourishing; so Eden signifieth pleasure: and yet both are the proper names of countries; for Eden being the proper name of a region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seat of all that region, Paradise was truly the garden of Eden, and truly the garden of pleasure.

Now, for eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the seventy; to the antient Greek fathers, as Basil, Chrysostom, Theodoret, Gregory; and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Solomon, R. Abraham, and Chimchi; and of the Latins, Severinus, Damascenus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a region, and set the word (eastward) for ab initio; for Damascene's own words are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad orientem mirabiliter constitus; Paradise is a place marvellously planted by the hands of God in Eden, towards the east.

And after all these fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of latter times, do both understand these words of Eden and of the east, contrary to the vulgar translation; Parisensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their own words; After this I will begin to speak of Paradise terrestrial, which God planted from the beginning, or eastward, &c. Post hæc incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum a Deo constitum in regione terræ orientalis, quæ dicitur Eden: Eden autem esse proprium nomen, apparet ex quarto capite Gen. ubi legimus, Cham habitasse ad orientalem plagam Eden; For Moses (saith he) doth shew most clearly, that Paradise was planted of God in a region of the east country, which is called Eden: but that Eden is a proper name, it appeareth in Genesis, where we read, that Cham dwelt on the east border of Eden. Pererius endeavoureth to qualify this translation; for this particle (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alledging this place of Christ, that although the devil was said to be a Man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I think (referring my self to better judgment) the devil was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till man's creation. And for conclusion, St. Hierome (if that be his translation) adviseth himself better in the end of the 3d chapter of Genesis, converting the word (Eden) by ante; and not (a principio) as, God did set a cherubin before the garden of Eden; Collocavit Deus ante paradisum voluptatis, cherubin; and Pererius himself acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew, Posuit a parte orientali horti Eden, cherubin; He set on the east side of the garden of Eden, a cherubin. Becanus affirmeth, that the Hebrew word Be signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the text teacheth this sense; That God planted a garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But Becanus followeth this construction, only to the end to set Paradise upon the river of Acesines; for that he hath heard of the Indian fig-tree in great abundance, which he supposeth to be the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and would therefore set Paradise to the fig-tree: which conceit of his shall answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was seated by Moses towards the east, thence came the custom of praying towards the east, and not by imitation of the Chaldeans; and therefore all our churches are built east and west, as to the point where the sun riseth in the east, which is directly over Paradise (saith Da- mascenus;) affirming, that we always pray towards the east, as looking towards Paradise, whence we were cast out; and yet the temple of Solomon had their priests and sacrifices, which turned themselves in their service and divine ceremonies, always towards the west, thereby to avoid the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldeans.

But because east and west are but in respect of places (for although Paradise were east from Judea, yet it was west from Persia) and the serving of God is every where in the world; the matter is not great, which way we turn our faces, so our hearts stand right; other than this, that we who dwell west from Paradise, and pray turning our selves to the east, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adam's fall we have lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christ's death and passion we may be made partakers of the Paradise celestial, and the kingdom of heaven. To conclude, I conceive, that there was no other mystery in adding the word (east) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the region of Eden, in which Paradise was, lay eastward from Judea and Canaan: for the scriptures always called the people of those nations, the sons of the east which inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldea, and Persia: of which Ovid,

Eurus ad aurozam, Nabathæaque regna recessit, Persidaque, & radiis juga subdita matutinis.

The east wind with aurora hath abiding Among th' Arabian and the Persian Hills, Whom Phæbus first salutes at his up-rising.

And if it be objected, that Jeremy the prophet, threatening the destruction of Jerusalem, doth often make mention of northern nations, it is to be noted, that the north is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of whom the greatest part of his army was compounded; not that Babylon it self stood north from Jerusalem, though inclining from the east towards the north.

Now to the difference of this translation, Peter Comestor giveth best satisfaction: for he useth the word, from the beginning, that is, from the first part of the world (a principio) id est (saith he) a prima orbis parte; and afterward he affirmeth, that a principio, and ad orientem, have the same signification: from the beginning, and east-ward, is all one; a principio idem est quod ad orientem.

But to return to the proof of this place, and that this story of mankind was not allegorical, it followeth in the text of the 2d chapter and 9th verse, in these words; For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meat, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere as in the world at large, and then put him into the garden: and the end why, is express'd, verse 18, that he might dress it and keep it: Paradise being a garden or orchard filled with plants, and trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withal) good for meat: which proveth that Paradise was a terrestrial garden, garnished with fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plain, and to take away all opinion of allegorical construction, he affirmeth, verse 10, that it was watered and beautified with a river; expressing also the region, out of which this river sprang, which he calleth Eden; and that Eden is also a country near unto Charon in Mesopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these cabalists, which draw the truth and story of the scriptures into allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these words; Si Paradisus non est sensibilis, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est

flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia; non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates; non est ficus, non folia, non comedit Eva de arbore; non est Adam, non sunt homines, sed veritas jam fabula est, & omnia ad allegorias revocantur; If Paradise be not sensible, then there was no fountain, and then no river; if no river, then no such four heads or branches, and then not any such river as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates; no such fig-tree, or fruit, or leaves; Eve then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any Adam, or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called back into allegories. Words to the same effect hath St. Hierome upon Daniel; Conticescant eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequentes, ipsam conantur evertere veritatem, ut Paradisum & flumina, & arbores putent allegoriæ legibus se debere subruere: Let the dotage of them be silent, who following shadows and images in the truth, endeavour to subvert the truth it self, and think that they ought to bring Paradise, and the rivers, and the trees, under the rules of allegory.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the story, is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free liberty to eat of every tree of the garden (the tree of knowledge excepted) which trees Moses in the 9th verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beasts to Adam to be named, which he had formerly made; and these beasts were neither in the third heaven, nor near the circle of the moon, nor beasts in imagination: for if all these things were enigmatical or mystical, the same might also be said of the creation of all things. And Ezekiel, speaking of the glory of the Assyrian kings, useth this speech; *“All the trees of Eden, which were in the garden of God, envied him; which proveth both Eden, and Paradise, therein seated, to be terrestrial: for the prophets made no imaginary comparisons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a simple style, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and he was more large and precise in the description of Paradise, than in any other place of scripture; of purpose to take away all scruple from the incredulity of future ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of prophecy) to be apt to fabulous inventions; and that if he had not described both the region and the rivers, and how it stood from Canaan, many of the unbelieving Israelites, and others after them, would have misconstrued this story of mankind. And, is it likely, there would have been so often mention made of Paradise in the scriptures, if the same had been an Utopia? For we find that the valley, wherein Sodom and Gomorrab stood (sometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principal cities therein) was before the destruction (which their unnatural sin purchased) compared to the Paradise of the Lord, and like to the land of Egypt toward Zoar: in like manner was Israel resembled to the Paradise of God, before the Babylonians wasted it: which proveth plainly, that Paradise it self, exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that these places had but a resemblance thereof: being compared to a feat and soil of far exceeding excellency.*

Besides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcmæon's gardens, as Justin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses's description of Paradise? Gen. ii. And whence are their praises of the Elysian fields, but out of the story of Paradise? To which also appertain those verses of the golden age in Ovid:

“Ter erat æternum; placidique tepentibus auris, Mullebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The joyful spring did ever last,
And Zephyrus did breed
Sweet flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the help of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and, after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their sectators, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the stolen treasures of divine letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical conversions, as if they had been conceived out of their own speculations and contemplations.

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what region Heden, or Eden was; if we prove the river that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was divided into four branches; together with the kingdoms of Havila, and Cush; and that all these are eastward from Canaan, or the desarts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceive, that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was. And yet I do not exclude the allegorical sense of the scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the Old Testament throughout: the story being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith St. Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententiæ: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will have it altogether corporal: a second of those, which conceive it altogether spiritual, and to be a figure of the church: the third of those, which take it in both senses; which third opinion St. Augustine approveth, and of which Suidas giveth this allowable judgment: “Quemadmodum homo sensibilis, & intelligibilis simul conditus erat: sic & hujus sanctissimum nemus sensibile simul & intelligibile, & duplici specie est præditum; (that is) As man was created at one time, both sensible, and intelligible, so was his holy grove, or garden, to be taken both ways, and endued with a double form.

SECT. IV.

Why it should be needful to intreat diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUT it may be objected, that it is needless, and a kind of curiosity, to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise, and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no use. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the story be necessary, then by the place proved, the same is also made more apparent. For if we should conceive that Paradise were not on the earth, but lifted up as high as the moon; or that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the known world; from whence, Adam was said to wade through the sea, and thence to have come into Judea (out of doubt) there would be few men in the world, that would give any credit unto it. For what could seem more ridiculous than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this feat of Paradise so much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Pishon should be Ganges, which watereth the east India; and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt: and these two rivers so far distant, as except all the world were Paradise these streams can no way be comprised therein?

Secondly, If the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been in some such country, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his miracles had been performed in the air, or no place certainly known: I assure my self, that the Christian religion would have taken but a slender root in the minds of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, If we should rely, or give place to the judgment of some writers upon this place of Genesis (though otherwise for their doctrine in general they are worthy of honour and reverence) I say that there is no fable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous: for who would believe that there were a piece of the world so set by it self, and separated, as to hang in the air under the circle of the moon? or who so doltish to conceive, that from thence the four rivers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tigris, should fall down, and run under all the ocean, and rise up again in this our habitable world, and in those places where they are now found? which lest any man think that I enforce, or strain to the worst, these are Peter Comestor's own words. Est autem locus amoenissimus, longo terræ & maris tractu a nostra habitabili Zona secretus, adeo elevatus, ut usque ad lunarem globum attingat, &c. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, severed from our habitable Zone, by a long tract of land and sea, elevated so, that it reacheth to the globe of the moon.

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deinde hoc quoque responsum volumus, Paradisum multo sublimiore positum esse regione, atque hæc nostra extet terra, eoque fieri ut illinc per præcipitium delabantur fluvii tanto cum impetu, quantum verbis exprimere non possis; eoque impetu impulsæ præcipue sub oceani vado rapiuntur, unde rursus præstant ebulliantque in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which have this sense: Furthermore (saith he) we give this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a region far raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to pass, that from thence these rivers fall down with such a headlong violence, as words cannot express; and with that force so impelled and press'd, they are carried under the deep ocean sea, and do again rise and boil up in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ishram, which is this: Ishram dicit, Paradisum ambire terram, atque ultra oceanum ita positum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, similiter atque lunæ orbis lunam cingit; (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole earth, and is so set beyond the ocean, as it envieth the whole orb of the earth on every side, as the orb of the moon doth embrace the moon. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions do not bring question unto truth it self, or make the same subject to doubts or disputes, it is necessary to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very navel of this our world, and (as Melanchton says) in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a center, the universal might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better judge of the beginning of nations, and of the world's inhabitation: for near unto this did the sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions and countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their own forefathers have come, and out of what regions and nations; it cannot be displeasing to understand the place of our first ancestor, from whence all the stems and branches of mankind have followed and been deduced. If then it do appear by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be unprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several opinions before remembred, by the truth it self; and to see how they agree with the sense of the scripture, and with common reason; and afterward to prove directly, and to delineate the region in which God first planted this delightful garden.

SECT. V.

That the flood hath not utterly defaced the marks of Paradise, nor caused hills in the earth.

AND first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Cyprianensis, that the flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can find any mark or memory thereof (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the flood the cause of those high mountains, which are found on all the earth over, with many other strange effects;) for mine own opinion, I think neither the one, nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the flood withered, and grown old, in respect of the first beauty (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things time hath changed;) yet if there had been no sign of any such place, or if the soil and seat had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850 years after the flood, have described it so particularly, and the prophets long after Moses, would not have made so often mention thereof. And though the very garden it self were not then to be found, but that the flood, and other accidents of time, made it one common field and pasture with the land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the rivers still remain the same rivers. By two of which (never doubted of) to wit, Tigris, and Euphrates, we are sure to find in what longitude Paradise lay; and learning out one of these rivers, which afterward doth divide it self into four branches, we are sure that the partition is at the very border of the garden it self.

For it is written, that out of Eden went a river to water the garden, and from thence it was divided, and became into four heads; now, whether the word in the Latin translation (unde) from thence, be referred to Eden it self, or to Paradise; yet the division, and branching of those rivers, must be in the north, or south side of the very garden (if the rivers run as they do, north and south;) and therefore these rivers yet remaining, and Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered, as future ages knew it not; so is there no probability that either these rivers were turned out of their courses, or new rivers created by the flood which were not, or that the flood (as aforesaid) by a violent motion, when it began to decrease, was the cause of high hills, or deep valleys. For what descent of waters could there be in a spherical and round body, wherein there is nor high nor low? seeing that all violent force of waters is either by the strength of wind, by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebb or flood of the sea. But that there was any wind (whereby the seas are most enraged) it appeareth not, rather the contrary is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to pass upon the earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appeareth not, that, until the waters sank, there was any wind at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to dry up the abundant slime and mud of the earth, and make the land more firm, and to cleanse the air of thick vapours, and unwholsome mists: and this we know by experience, that all downright rains do evermore disperse the violence of outrageous winds, and beat down, and level the swelling and mountainous billows of the sea: for any ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equal, and of one height, over all the face of the earth, and when there were no indraughts, bays, or gulfs to receive a flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round form of the earth and waters, as aforesaid: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calm, than that they moved with any raging or over-bearing violence. And for a more direct proof that the flood made no such destroying alteration, Josephus avoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seen in his days; which pillars were set up above 1426 years before the flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the erection of them; and Joseph himself to have lived some forty or fifty years after Christ: of whom, altho' there be no cause to believe all that he wrote, yet that which he avouched of his own time, cannot (without great derogation) be called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruin thereof might then be seen. Now, that such pillars were raised by Seth, all antiquity hath avowed. It is also written that Berosus (to whom, altho' I give little credit, yet I cannot condemn him in all) that the city of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountains of Libanus was not defaced by length of time: yea, the ruins thereof, Annius (who commented upon that invented fragment) saith, were to be seen in his days, who liv'd in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this city of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cujus maxime & ingentis molis fundamenta visuntur, & vocatur ab incolis regionis, Civitas Cain, ut nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt; The foundation of which huge mass is now to be seen, and the place is called by the people of that region, the City of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also avowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I give more credit in these things) that the city of Joppa was built before the flood, over which Cepha was king: whose name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their religion, was found graven upon certain altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruins of this other city, called Enoch by Annius, might be seen, tho' founded in the first age: but it could not be of the first city of the world, built by Cain; the place rather than the time denying it.

And to prove directly that the flood was not the cause of mountains, but that there were mountains from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the flood overflowed by fifteen cubits the highest mountains. And Masius Damascenus, speaking of the flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excelsa mons in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo coefferentes multos, sermo est, diluvii tempore liberatos; And upon Minyada there is an high mountain in Armenia (called Baris) unto which, it is said, that many fled in the time of the deluge, and that they saved themselves thereon. Now, tho' it is contrary to God's word, that any more were saved than eight persons (which Masius doth not avouch, but by report) yet it is a testimony, that such mountains were before the flood, which were afterwards, and ever since, known by the same names, and on which mountains it is generally received that the ark rested; but untruly, as I shall prove hereafter. And again it appeareth, that the mount Sion (tho' by another name) was known before the flood; on which the Thalmudists report, that many giants saved themselves also; but (as Annius saith) without all authority, either divine or human.

Lastly, it appeareth that the flood did not so turn upside down the face of the earth, as thereby it was made past knowledge, after the waters were decreased, by this, that <sup>b</sup> when Noah sent out the dove the second time, she returned with an olive-leaf in her mouth, which she had pluck'd, and which (until the trees were discovered) she found not: for otherwise she might have found them floating on the water; a manifest proof, that the trees were not torn up by the roots, nor swam upon the waters, for it is written, folium olivæ raptum, or decerptum, a leaf pluck'd; which is, to take from a tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparent (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seen to succeeding ages, especially unto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the world's creation, and unto the prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this discovery.

SECT. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole earth, as some have thought: making the ocean to be the fountain of those four rivers.

THIS conceit of Aug. Chrysamenfis being answered, who only giveth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noviomagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that understood, that by Paradise was meant the whole earth. But in this I shall not trouble the reader with many words, because by those places of scripture formerly remember'd, this universality will appear altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alledgeth, <sup>c</sup> Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the earth and subdue it, rule over every creature, &c. with this of the Acts, <sup>d</sup> And hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the earth, do no way prove such a generality: for the world was made for man, of which he was lord and governour, and all things therein were ordained of God for his use. Now, altho' all men were of one and the same fountain of blood originally; and Adam's posterity inhabited in process of time over all the face of the earth: yet it disproveth in nothing the particular garden, assigned to <sup>e</sup> Adam to dress and cultivate, in which he lived in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had been no other choice, but that Adam had been left to the universal, Moses would not then have said <sup>f</sup> eastward in Eden, seeing the world hath not east nor west but respectively. And to what end had the angel of God been set to keep the east side, and entrance into Paradise after Adam's expulsion, if the universal had been Paradise? for then must Adam have been chased also out of the world. For if all the earth were Paradise, that place can receive no better construction than this, That Adam was driven out of the world into the world, and out of Paradise into Paradise except we should believe with Alethodorus, that there were infinite worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one as to affirm, That in so large a field as the universal, there should grow but one thistle. Noviomagus upon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it was impossible for those three rivers, Ganges, Nilus and Euphrates (which water three portions of the world so far distant) to rise out of one fountain, except the ocean be taken for the well, and the world for the garden.

And it is true, that those four rivers, being so understood, there could be no conjecture more probable; but it shall plainly appear, that Pison was falsely taken for Ganges, and Gehon falsely for Nilus, altho' Ganges be a river by Havila in India, and Nilus runs thro' Ethiopia. The Seventy write Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Mani-lics, and the mistakings of Noviomagus, Goropius and Iudianus, with others, are made manifest. Yet was their conjecture far more probable than that of Ephrem, Cyrillus and Athanasius, That Paradise was seated far beyond the Ocean sea, and that Adam waded through it, and at last came toward the country in which he was created, and was buried at mount Calvary in Jerusalem. And certainly, tho' all those of the first age were of great stature, and so continued many years after the flood, yet Adam's shin-bones must have contained a thousand fathom, and much more, if he had forded the ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

SECT. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the moon: and of others which make it higher than the middle region of the air.

THirdly whereas Beda saith, and as the school-men affirm, Paradise to be a place altogether removed from the knowledge of men (locus a cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceived, that Paradise was far in the east, but mounted above the ocean, and all the earth, and near the orb of the moon (which opinion, tho' the school-men charge Beda withal, yet Pererius lays it off from Beda, upon Strabus, and his master Rabanus) and whereas Rupertus, in his geography of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but finds it seated next or nearest heaven; it may seem, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceive) well understood; who (undoubtedly) took this place for heaven it self, into which the souls of the blessed were carried after death.

True it is, that these philosophers durst not for fear of the Areopagites (in this, and many other divine apprehensions) set down what they believed in plain terms, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death for acknowledging one only powerful God; and therefore did the devil himself do him that right, as by an oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Justin Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the scriptures; and St. Augustine gave this judgment of him, as his opinion, that (few things changed) he might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to me, that both Tertullian and Augustinus conceive, that Socrates, by that place Paradise, meant the celestial Paradise, and not this earthly. Solinus, I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightful, and healthful, upon the top of mount Atlas (called Acrithonos) which lies above all clouds of rain, or other inconveniences, the people (by reason of their so many years) called Macrobi (that is) long-liv'd. A further argument is used for proof of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preserved from the violence of the flood: approved by Isidore and Peter Lombard: in which place also Tertullian conceived, that the blessed souls were preserved till the last judgment: which Irenaeus and Justin Martyr also believed. But this opinion was of all catholic divines reprov'd, and in the Florentine council damned; of which St. Augustine more modestly gave this judgment: Sicut certum est Enoch & Eliam, nunc vivere: ita ubi nunc sunt, an in paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certain that Enoch and Elias do now live; so where they now live, in paradise, or elsewhere, it is uncertain. But Barcephas gives a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the four rivers (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not have had sufficient force to have thrust themselves under the great ocean, and afterward have forced their passage thro' the earth, and have risen again in the far distant regions of India, Egypt, and Armenia.

These strange fancies and dreams have been answered by divers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Pererius, writing upon this subject; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: (for to use long discourse against those things, which are both against scripture and reason, might rightly be judged a vanity in the answerer, not much inferiour to that of the inventor.)

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to live in: for being set so near the moon, it had been too near the sun, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must have been too joyn'd a neighbour to the element of fire. Thirdly, because the air in that region is so violently removed, and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding. Fourthly, because the space between the earth and the moon (according to Ptolemy and Alfraganus) is seventeen times the diameter of the earth, which makes in a gross account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise, being raised to this height, must have the compass of the whole earth for a basis and foundation. But had it been so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men, seeing it would deprive us of the sun's light all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the east, as they suppose. Now, to fortify the former opinions, Tostatus addeth this, that those people which dwell near those falls of waters, are dead from their infancy, like those that dwell near the Catadupe, or over-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as feigned. For I have seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling near them are not dead at all. Tostatus (better to strengthen himself) citeth Basil and Ambrose together: to which Pererius, Sed ego haec apud Basilium & Ambrosium in eorum scriptis, quae nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; But I do not remember (saith he) that I ever read those things either in Basil or Ambrose.

But for the bodies of Enoch and Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestial Paradise, for ought we know. For altho' flesh and blood, subject to corruption, cannot inherit the kingdom of heaven, and the seed must rot in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith St. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change in Enoch and Elias, was easy to him that is almighty. But for the rest, the scriptures are manifest, that by the flood all perished on the earth saving eight perfons; and therefore in the terrestrial Paradise they could not be.

For Tostatus's own opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but believed that Paradise was raised above the middle region of the air, and twenty cubits above all mountains; that the flood did not therefore reach it (which Scotus and other latter school-men also believed; for, say they, there were no finners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to overwhelm it:) this is also contrary to the express letter of the scripture, which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth us, that <sup>a</sup> the waters over-flowed all the mountains under heaven. And were it otherwise, then might we as well give credit to Masius Damasceus, and the Thalmudists, who affirm, that there were of the giants that saved themselves on the mountain Baris, and on Sion. But to help this, Scotus being (as the rest of the school-men are) full of distinctions, saith; that the waters stood at Paradise, as they did in the <sup>b</sup> red sea, and at Jordan; and as the flood was not natural, so was Paradise saved by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifyeth his high conceit with this supposition, that it was not believed, that Paradise was so seated, as Bede and others seem to affirm in words, but by hyperbole and comparatively, for the delicacy and beauty so resembled. But this I dare avow of all those school-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their followers to thirt, than to resolve, by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tostatus, I confess that it is written, that the mountains of Olympus, Atbo, and Atlas, over-reach and surmount all winds and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan priests, sacrificing on these mountain-tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blown thence, nor thence washed off by rains, when they return: yet experience hath resolved us, that these reports are fabulous; and Pliny himself (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) avoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these mountains is far under the supposed place of Paradise; and on these self hills the air is so thin (saith St. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to bear up the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of air to mount her self by.

SECT. VIII.

Of their opinion that seat Paradise under the Equinoctial: and of the pleasant habitation under those climates.

THOSE which come nearer unto reason find Paradise under the Equinoctial line, as Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Dionandus; judging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soil: but against it Thomas Aquinas objecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly under the sun; but this is non causa pro causa; for although Paradise could not be under the line, because Eden is far from it, in which Paradise was; and because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges under it (Ganges being one of the four rivers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper (being but an old opinion) is found to be very untrue, though for the conjecture not to be condemned, considering the age, when those fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas it appeared, that every country, as it lay by degrees nearer the tropick, and so toward the Equinoctial, did so much the more exceed in heat; it was therefore a reasonable conjecture, that those countries which were situated directly under it, were of a distemper uninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceived better and so did Avicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough: and though (perchance) in those days it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which go against the vulgar;) yet we now find, that if there be any place upon the earth of that nature, beauty, and delight, that Paradise had, the same must be found within that supposed uninhabitable burnt zone, or within the tropicks, and nearest to the line it self. For hereof experience hath informed reason, and time hath made those things apparent, which were hidden, and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to provide for all living creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconveniences which we contemplate afar off, are found by trial and the witness of mens travels, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vain, or as a fruitless lump to fashion out the rest. For God himself (saith Isaiah) that formed the earth and made it, he that prepared it, he created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we find that these hottest regions of the world seated under the Equinoctial line, or near it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of easterly wind (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth evermore blow strongest in the heat of the day, as the downright beams of the sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconvenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh and equal, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my self have seen, near the line and under it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equal temper, only there are some tracts, which by accident of high mountains are barr'd from this air and fresh wind, and some few sandy parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soils we find also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those regions have so many goodly rivers, fountains and little brooks, abundance of high cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, so many sorts of delicate fruits, ever bearing, and at all times beautified with blossom and fruit, both green and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradise of Eden: the boughs and branches are never unclothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not under ground into the root, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any times despise her withered husband Vertumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these countries called Terre vitiosæ, vicious countries: for nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the school-men were gross in this particular.

SECT. IX.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Cœlesyria, there is a country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proved out of Isaiah xxxvii, and Ezek. xxvii.

THESSE opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary worlds, nor under Torrida Zona; it followeth the now we discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it was Paradise by God planted. The difficulty of which search resteth chiefly in this, that as all nations have often changed names with their masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered, forgotten by those names of all historians and geographers as well ancient as modern.

Besides, we find that the Affyrians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus only and few others excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrews. The Greeks hated both their nation and their religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their stories. And as those three monarchies succeeded each other; so did they transform the names of all those principal places and cities in the east: and after them, the Turks hath sought (what he could) to extinguish in all things the ancient memory of those people, which he hath subjected and intralled.

Now besides those notable marks, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) that it lay eastward from Canaan and Judea; and that it was of all others the most beautiful and fertile. First in respect of situation, the next country to Judea eastward was Arabia Petrea; but in this region was Moses himself when he wrote: and the next unto it eastward was Arabia the Desart, both which in respect of the infertility could not be Eden, neither have any of the Arabians any such rivers, as are expressed to run out of it: so as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petrea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it self, and by the fertility and the rivers only described, we must seek it in other scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour nations better described. In the prophet Isaiah I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent countries, in these words spoken in the person of Senacherib by Rabsakeb. <sup>a</sup> Have the Gods of the nations delivered them, which my fathers have destroyed, as Goshan and Haran and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telassar. and in Ezekiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrans: <sup>b</sup> They of Haran and Canneh, of Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Ashur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to avoid confusion, we must understand that there were two Edens, one of which the prophet Isaiah remembreth, where he divideth Syria into three provinces, whereof the first he maketh Syria Damascene, or Decapolitan: the second part is that valley called Azenis, otherwise Corvallis, or the foot of Chamath, where Affyria is joyned to Arabia the Desart and where <sup>c</sup> Ptolemy placeth the city of Arctus: and the third is known by the name of Damascus, or Celestria, otherwise vallis arva, or the hollow valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Coile in Greek is called L. arva. But this is not that Eden, which we seek: neither doth this province lie east from Canaan, but north, and so joyneth unto it as it could be unknown to the Hebrews. Yet, because there is a little city therein called Paradise, the Jews believed this Celestria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his treatise of Paradise reprehend Beroaldus, that he confoundeth this Eden with the other Paradise: tho' to give Beroaldus his right, I perceive that he led the way to Hopkins, and to other later writers, saying that he failed in dis-
